לאחרונה הקימה חברת "אאורה" הישראלית מבנה של תחנת כוח תרמו –סולארית ראשונה מסוגה בעולם, שמשלבת אנרגית שמש עם דלקים שונים בנסיון לייעל את התהליך.
התחנה הוקמה על שטח זעיר של שני דונאם בקיבוץ סמאר בערבה, ובשלב זה מספקת חשמל ימים חמים ל 70 משפחות. זה הופך אותה לתחנה המסחרית הראשונה מסוגה בישראל.
מנהל הייצור של החברה, יובל סופקינד, מספר לי שבקליפורניה למשל נחקק חוק שלפחות עשרה אחוזים מהחשמל חייבים להיות מיוצרים בשיטות ירוקות, וכך נוצר שוק עם פוטנציאל עצום לחברות ישראליות.
מה נאמר, הפיכתה של שמש יולי אוגוסט (וגם ינואר עבראר) לחשמל ואנרגיה- זהו העתיד. והעתיד הזה מתרחש עכשיו בארץ הקודש.

AMREEKA-סרט שכדאי

AMREEKA היא הצורה שבה מבטאים ערביי ארץ ישראל והמזרח התיכון את שמה של ארץ החלומות. הסרט "אמריקה" מתאר את תלאותיהם של גרושה נוצרייה, תושבת הגדה המערבית, ובנה תלמיד התיכון. מתמזל מזלם והם מקבלים גרין קארד ונוסעים לאיחוד משפחות עם אחותה ומשפחתה באיליניי. מה שעובר עליהם שם הוא די צפוי- גזענות על היותם "מרוויסטים", חוסר היכולת להשיג עבודה, וכל שאר הדברים הלא נעימים שקורים למהגרים, ובעיקר ל "וויזבל מיינוריטיס".
המיוחד בסרט היא גישתה החיובית והאופטימיות הבלתי נלאית של אם המשפחה, אופטימיות שבסופו של דבר מנה את הכף לטובתם. הסרט יכול היה להיעשות בזעם, בכאב, בצעקה, אבל הוא נעשה בחיוך והבנה, ובכך גדולתו.
ולצד הגיבורים שעוברים קשיים גדולים, יש בסרט דקות של נחת של אמריקאים טובים שעוזרים למהגרים הפלשתינאים שלא על מנת לקבל פרס. סתם אנשים ימים, שעושים את החיים לשווים יותר.
סרט שיעשה לכם טוב. שמונה בסולם קורן.

SHARANSKY MEETS STUDENT JOURNALISTS

While attending the Jewish Federations of North America's General Assembly in Washington earlier this month, Jewish Agency chairman Natan Sharansky, centre, in black suit jacket, spoke to a group of student journalists from around North America. The students were taking part in "Do the Write Thing," a Jewish media program sponsored by the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency.

Bone marrow/stem cell registry held at McMaster

By CARA STERN
Special to The CJN

Jewish students at McMaster University recently swabbed mouths for a cause to collect DNA for the OneMatch bone marrow and stem cell registry.

Managed by Canadian Blood Services, OneMatch has a database that contains the tissue types of the registrants. This database is used to find a match for patients awaiting a stem cell transplant.

McMaster University's Alpha Epsilon Pi chapter's philanthropic chair Dustin Shulman, left, helped register about 760 students for the OneMatch bone marrow and stem cell registry.

The registry, which took place on Nov. 9, was organized by McMaster's chapter of the international Jewish fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi.

Dustin Shulman, philanthropic chair for the chapter and main organizer of the Got Swabbed event, said he was inspired to plan the event when he heard the story of Jonathan Grossman, a Thornhill, Ont., man who was searching for a bone marrow match last spring.

"I was astonished by the determination to find a match and the community's positive response in finding one," he said.

Despite the transplant, Grossman died from chemotherapy complications on Aug. 30.

Shari Silverman, a Thornhill woman with leukemia, is currently seeking a match and has set up the Shari Mission, which aims to collect registrants as potential donors.

Her family members volunteered in the McMaster drive through recruiting students.

The Shari Mission recently organized several drives in the Thornhill area.

The odds of finding a match are very low, said Shulman, explaining that there is less than a 30 per cent chance of a match within the patient's family, and the chances decrease the further outside their family they go.

He said there is ultimately less than a one per cent chance of a registrant being paired with a patient through the database.

"We have over 760 people who were swabbed on Monday," he said. "That means, statistically, six or seven people will have their lives saved because of this event."

John Bromley, the national communications manager for OneMatch, said the main message was to increase the number of Jews involved in the registry.

"Even though Jewish people come under the Caucasian group, they still have a better chance of finding a match through the Jewish community," he said, adding that 82 per cent of the registry is Caucasian, so there is also a strong focus on promoting diversity in the registry in general.

The goal was to break the world record of new bone marrow registrants collected in a single day.

Shulman said members of the fraternity stayed in the student centre overnight because the record requirement was a 24-hour drive.

Although they fell short of the record by about 200 people, Shulman said the turnout was fantastic, with the final number somewhere above 760 new registrants.

"The record isn't the biggest deal," he said. "I think going for it and doing our best is what it was really about."

Jackie Brown, first-year representative for the Jewish Students' Association, said she signed up to volunteer to help swab for a couple of hours, but ended up staying for five or six hours.

"It was an amazing experience," she said. "A lot of the time, if there's a table set up in the students' centre, people just walk by them, but we actually had lines of people waiting to register."

Bromley agreed the event was a huge success, and the fraternity sent a strong message that they want to make a difference.

And now for something completely different: HEEBONICS

Representing the tribe on the force

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Police Service recently got a little more "kosher." In September, three Jewish police recruits graduated from Toronto Police College and are now in active service on the force.

Heebonics/The CJN spoke to one of them last month about what it took to get there and how it feels to be representing the tribe as a police constable.

Eytan (Ed) Hadad, 37, has spent the last 10 years focusing on one goal: becoming a Toronto cop. Anyone who knows him understands this has been his passion for some time; though the cigarette-smoking, sedentary lifestyle he used to espouse hardly inspired faith that he'd ever get his dream job.

[Full disclosure: Ed has been a friend since childhood. We lost touch for a few years before reconnecting recently when I learned about his employment on the force.]

Growing up in a traditional Jewish home in Laval, Que., Hadad ended up marrying and moving to Toronto. He'd worked numerous jobs, but experienced an "aha!" moment where the notion of serving and protecting the public hit him like a Taser shot.

"I just had a feeling this is what I was born to do, what I was destined to do," he said.

Part of that may have come from his experiences working with and helping physically challenged people when he was 17 years old.

He spent a lot of time helping a good friend's brother, who was stricken with muscular dystrophy, get through his day-to-day life and then spent some time in Israel working with the elderly.

Still, all that good work and selfless giving took awhile to translate into motivation to give back to himself.

Though he realized he wanted to join the police force a decade ago, actually pursuing the dream took some time.

"It took me five years to get off my ass and do something about it," he said. "I was putting on weight, I was smoking, I was lazy. And then something happened – I noticed I couldn't breathe when I bent over to tie my shoes. That's when I knew it was time to get in shape."

And he did. Spending the next five years diligently training at the gym, mountain biking, eating well and staying in shape physically.

He also took note of the prerequisites demanded by the Toronto Police Service of all potential applicants and hit the library to teach himself algebra.

"My one goal was to become a cop," Hadad said, adding that while his parents weren't thrilled with the idea – his mother thought it was too dangerous and his father thought he wouldn't be able to make a living, he said – his wife and children were completely supportive.

While he's not strictly observant, Hadad does think some divine intervention helped him straighten out his career choice and place him where he needed to be.

"In a way, I believe [God] put me here, but in another way I don't believe this," he said. "I grew up in a religious home. Am I here to fulfil a [part] in the great scheme of things that God has put before humanity? I don't know. Am I here to help? Yes. I believe that. I'm trying to make the world a better place. Most definitely."

Having only been on the force a short time, Hadad has already seen his share of the evil and good capable of mankind.

He said he had his biggest shock on the job when he was asked to investigate a suicide with his partner.

"It was like something out of a movie. It had an eerie feel. To see death and smell death... is unexpected. What people can do to each other is a shocker," he said.

On the flip side, there have been some rewarding moments, when citizens have shown respect for his role.

"The young and the old constantly say 'hi' to you. They show you so much respect. The little ones are so happy to see you. You're so cool to them. They say, 'Wow! Is that a real gun?' That's very nice. That, and the free coffee Tim Horton's like to give," he quipped.

When asked if he could provide a photo for this story, Hadad denied the request, saying he wanted to keep his options open to join the undercover unit at some point and did not want his likeness in print for fear it could compromise him in the future.

Hadad is currently posted at Division 13 – covering an area between Lawrence Avenue in the north, Dupont Street in the south, Spadina Road in the east and the CNR tracks on the west side – where he's been alternating between day and night shifts.

Speaking about his role as a Jewish cop and feelings as one of the few Jews on the force, he said he's thankful he hasn't yet been on one call "where I've had to deal with a Jewish [person] in serious bodily harm or creating anything evil. Traffic tickets are a different matter."

On how he feels about facing danger in the line of duty: it comes with the territory, he said.

"A Hell's Angel can take their patch off. An officer in the primary response unity can't take off his uniform. So we're constantly a target."

In the end though, attaining his goal of becoming an officer has been well worth the effort.

"There hasn't been a day yet where I've said to myself 'I hate this job.' So far, so good."

End occupation before declaring state, Hamas tells PA

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Hamas on Monday rejected a Palestinian Authority suggestion to seek international support for unilaterally declaring a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, saying true independence required the complete cessation of Israeli occupation.

Chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said Sunday that frustrated Palestinians had decided to turn to the United Nations Security Council after 18 years of on-again, off-again talks with Israel.

Hamas responded to the suggestion by pointing out that a unilateral declaration of statehood had already been made by late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat in 1988.

If it has to be done again, Hamas spokesman Salah Bardweel suggested on Monday, "why not declare a Palestinian state from the sea [Mediterranean] to the river [of Jordan]" rather than in the West Bank and Gaza only.

Erekat has stated that PA officials would ask the Security Council to recognize an independent Palestinian state within the 1967 borders with Jerusalem as its capital.

The declaration proposed by Erekat would have no meaning and was merely an attempt by the rival Palestinian camp of President Mahmoud Abbas to pretend it has an alternative to faltering peace negotiations, other than armed struggle, said Bardweel.

Saeb Erekat

"This move is not a meaningful declaration. It simply aims at escaping the benefits of resistance against the occupation," he said. "Instead of threatening to unilaterally declare a Palestinian state to be established in the air, we should work on liberating the occupied territories and end the current internal [Palestinian] division."

Declaring a state "in the air on 20 per cent of the Palestinian land, which would be rejected by the world," was not the solution, he argued. Rather, Palestinians should focus on their own "ability to liberate the land."

Responding to the statement by Erekat, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Sunday that unilateral actions to declare a Palestinian state could cause Israel to take unilateral action of its own.

"The way to achieve peace is through negotiations, co-operation and the agreement of both sides. This is true with regard to security and economic issues, and also with regard to a genuine political process. There is no substitute for negotiations between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, and any unilateral attempt outside that framework will unravel the existing agreements between us, and could entail unilateral steps by Israel," Netanyahu told the prestigious Saban Forum in Jerusalem.

Those unilateral steps, some Netanyahu administration officials said Monday, could include annexing West Bank settlements or halting the transfer of tax money collected for the Palestinian Authority.

Netanyahu stressed that a strong economy and a stable security situation will help bring peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

He cited the easing of movement in the West Bank for Palestinians and the improvement of the quality of life for Palestinians as ways that Israel has contributed to a prosperous Palestinian economy that has helped to "eliminate the scourge of poverty and desperation and strengthen internal forces within Palestinian society that oppose terrorism."

On Sunday, Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad said that the declaration of a Palestinian state would be a mere formality once the institutions of a Palestinian state are created.

Speaking at a joint press conference with U.S. Senator Joseph Lieberman in Ramallah organized by the Saban Forum, Fayyad said it's important to create institutions that are functioning, committed to the Palestinian people and free of corruption.

"I know some people are concerned that this is unilateral," Fayyad said, referring to his development plan. "But it seems to me that it is unilateral in a healthy sense of self-development."

Fayyad said building national institutions is an important step in preparation for the establishment of a Palestinian state within the 1967 borders with Jerusalem as its capital.

Turkey and Israel hold joint military drill

By YOSSI MELMAN

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Israel, Jordan, and Turkey conducted a joint search and rescue military drill two weeks ago, the Turkish daily Zaman reported on Monday, pointing to an apparent ease in recent tensions between Jerusalem and Ankara.

The exercise reportedly took place in the Turkish army's special forces training ground, in the vicinity of the Turkish capital.

Zaman also reported that the exercise was deemed a success by all parties.

The newspaper report added that Industry and Trade Minister Benjamin Ben Eliezer was scheduled to visit Turkey in 10 days.

The Turkish daily also reported that Israel was ready to complete a long-delayed weapons deal with Turkey, cited by some sources as the catalyst for recent tensions between the allies.

Technical problems leading to a two-year delay of 10 Heron-type drones have finally been resolved, according to the report.

Turkey signed the $180-million deal to purchase the drones from Israel Aerospace Industries and Elbit several years ago. Israeli media reported that Turkey was considering scrapping the deal when Israel failed to meet production deadlines.

Turkish Defence Minister Vecdi Gonul, however, denied that Turkey would had any plans to cancel the contract.

A Turkish defence source said Monday that Israel and Turkey were in the midst of negotiating how much Israel would pay in compensation over the missed deadline.

An Israeli official denied the official's remark, saying that the Israeli defence industry had met every clause in their contract with Turkey.

"They're looking for excuses. There were no delays aside for minor problems with a local manufacturer that was producing some of the parts for the drones, but that has nothing to do with Israel," the source said.

A Turkish air force official told Zaman last month that the delayed deal was the real reason Ankara had banned Israel from a NATO air force exercises on its territory, and not – as Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan had said – because of its opposition to Israel's offensive on the Gaza Strip.

"Turkey needs those vehicles in its fight against terror. What led to the recent crisis between Turkey and Israel was the delay in the delivery," a Turkey air force official told Zaman.

The report quoted a Turkish government spokesperson and Deputy Prime Minister Cemil Cicek as saying that a proposal for the cancellation of the drill came from the General Staff as a response to yet another delay in the delivery of the Israeli drones to Turkey.

"The proposal for cancellation came from the General Staff, not the government. However, there was no disagreement between the two bodies on the decision," Cicek was quoted as saying.

The report stressed that the Turkish government had no hand in the decision to cancel the exercise. "The Anatolian Eagle [exercise] is an organization of the Turkish Armed Forces. It is up to the air forces and the General Staff to decide on which countries will participate in the exercises. The government has not interfered in the decision," Cicek was quoted as saying.

The Turkish-Israeli crisis reached a peak on Jan. 29 after Turkish Prime Minister Erdogan walked out of a panel discussion in Davos in protest of Israel's offensive in the Gaza Strip.

Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu also commented on the recent drill crisis and called on every country to refrain from any act that could harm the atmosphere of peace and stability in the region.

Last month, AFP quoted Erdogan as saying that "diplomatic sensitivities" led his government to ban Israel from a joint NATO air force drill.

"There is military co-operation between Turkey and Israel… but currently there are diplomatic sensitivities that we have to take into consideration," AFP quoted Edrogan as telling the Dubai-based channel Al-Arabiya.

"We have taken the conscience of our people into consideration when we decided… I had to be the voice that expresses the existence of my people, and my people were rejecting Israel's participation.

"We discussed it with the responsible parties and said yes, these drills will take place but Israel will not take part in them," he had said.

Swedish journalist reconsiders

A journalist who accused Israeli soldiers of harvesting Palestinian organs in a popular Swedish newspaper is reconsidering his position. Donald Bostrom cancelled a scheduled appearance at a conference in Beirut after a visit to Israel in which he participated in dialogue on the issue, according to Army Radio. Bostrom was in Israel last month for a media conference in Dimona. The Beirut conference was set to be an anti-Israel hate fest, according to reports. "The visit to Israel and the fact that I was part of a fair dialogue made me rethink the whole issue," Bostrom reportedly told associates, according to Ha'aretz.

9/11 monument built in Jerusalem

A monument to the victims of 9/11 was dedicated in Jerusalem. The monument, commissioned and built by the Jewish National Fund-USA/Keren Kayemet LeIsrael, depicts the World Trade Center and Pentagon through sculpture and landscape architecture. Designed by award-winning Israeli artist Eliezer Weishoff, the 30-foot high bronze sculpture is composed of a waving American flag transformed into a memorial flame. It rests on a gray granite base, part of which is from the original Twin Towers. The sculpture is surrounded by a circular, crater-like plaza and reflection area tiled in stone. The Jerusalem monument is the only site outside of New York to recognize the names of every victim of the attack, engraved on bronze plaques surrounding the sculpture.

Hezbollah vetoes Anne Frank

Hezbollah pressured a private school in Beirut to drop from its curriculum a textbook containing excerpts of The Diary of Anne Frank. The English-language school, which asked not to be identified, acceded to pressure after Hezbollah's Al-Manar television station ran a segment chiding the school for including the posthumously published Holocaust memoir in its lessons, the French news agency AFP reported. Hezbollah, which Israel and Canada consider a terrorist group, called the diary's inclusion part of "an open arena for the Zionist invasion of education." Attorney Naim Kalaani, a member of a committee to ban Zionist products, told Al-Manar the use of the book in a school constituted a violation of Lebanon's penal code and is "tantamount to a step toward normalization" in ties with Israel.

Peres honored in Brazil

Israeli President Shimon Peres became an honorary citizen of Brazil's capital, Brasilia. The honour was granted last week during Peres' visit to the Brazilian Congress. "This title is a great honour to me and to all the people of Israel. Brasilia is the capital of a new world," Peres declared. Peres is the first Israeli president to visit Brazil in 40 years. He had a heavy five-day agenda, including a meeting with President Luis Inacio Lula da Silva and several other government officials. Peres also attended long-anticipated meetings with the Jewish communities in Sao Paulo and Rio de Janeiro, which are home to most of the country's 120,000 Jews. Peres told the Brazilian media before leaving Israel that he would discuss with Lula the issue of peace negotiations in the Middle East, but he would not tackle the subject of Iran, although the Islamic Republic's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad will be welcomed by Brazil next week. Giora Becher, Israel's ambassador to Brazil, said that "Brazil has a very important role in supporting and helping the moderate forces in the Arab world, and among the Palestinians against terrorists, and against those who don't believe in the peace process and don't recognize Israel's right to exist."

Alleged Jewish terrorist charged

During a hearing last week, a Jerusalem district prosecutor said Yaakov Teitel will be indicted for two murders of Palestinians later this week. He also will be charged with incitement to racism, unlawful possession of explosives and weapons and sabotage, according to reports. Teitel, 37, was arrested Oct. 7 in a joint police-Shin Bet operation. Along with allegedly killing two Palestinians, he also allegedly assembled a package bomb that seriously injured the son of a messianic Jew and set up a pipe bomb near the home of prominent professor Ze'ev Sternhell. A Florida native, Teitel made aliyah in 2000.

Plans for new Palestinian city in West Bank raise hopes

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

RAWABI, West Bank — Dusk has fallen on a terraced hillside, and workers clearing the red earth hurry to finish planting trees in the twilight, their labour the initial step in the construction of the first-ever planned Palestinian city.

The city, with a construction price tag of some $350 million (US), already has its city limits registered, a name – Rawabi, Arabic for hills – and funding from the government of Qatar. It's located about five miles north of Ramallah.

The Ramallah-based developers, who plan to start building soon, hail the project as a prized and much-needed example of Palestinian economic development. Israeli officials are among those citing it as a symbol of Palestinian progress.

"At the heart of this, it's about building a nation," says Bashar Masri, chair of the board of the Bayti Real Estate Investment Company, which is running the project. "We have dreamed about a liberal, advanced state with a higher standard of living, and this project is part of those aspirations."

Masri, 48, sits behind a sleek, lime-coloured glass desk in his office. He envisions the city as a place of good living and employment. He talks animatedly about the work opportunities it will provide, not only in construction, but as a commercial centre.

Eventually, Masri says, Rawabi will have schools, a hotel, a shopping centre, health clinics – and up to 40,000 residents.

The sunny plans for Rawabi, despite lingering bureaucratic challenges with the Israeli and Palestinian authorities, dovetail with an increasingly positive picture of economic growth in the West Bank, economists say.

In Ramallah, the most prosperous Palestinian city and its financial hub, high-end restaurants are crowded, a new chain of cafes recently opened, billboards advertise top-of-the-line washing machines, and cranes to produce high-rise buildings dot the hilltops. One building under construction will even feature a rotating rooftop restaurant.

What impact the unstable Palestinian political situation will have on that growth is unclear.

For the time being, International Monetary Fund officials say economic growth in the West Bank could reach as much as seven per cent in 2009 if Israel continues to relax restrictions, notably the removal of roadblocks.

Such growth would indicate a major improvement in living standards in the area in the past three years, although the economy has yet to recover to pre-intifadah levels from the summer of 2000. Unemployment in the West Bank is 18 per cent, down from 25 per cent in 2004.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu touts Palestinian economic prosperity in the West Bank as paving the way for political peace. Since coming to office in March, Netanyahu has removed a series of checkpoints, helping ease the movement of people and goods between West Bank towns and cities.

By contrast, Hamas-controlled Gaza remains largely blockaded by both Israel and Egypt, its economy in shambles.

Palestinians say that while some relief has come with the dismantling of checkpoints, the ones that remain – including makeshift ones that move daily – contribute to a fragile situation. Economic growth is not a substitute for political progress, they say.

"Economic progress helps and is desperately needed to make peace dividends stick, but you cannot ensure economic stability without political progress," Masri says. "Political instability can always blow up in our faces."

In 1995, inspired by the prospects for peace following the signing of the Oslo accords, Masri returned to the West Bank after years living in the United States. When the second intifadah began in 2000, the road outside his office was often crowded with Israeli tanks and army jeeps. His offices are in the same neighbourhood as the Muqata, the Palestinian Authority headquarters where Yasser Arafat spent time under siege.

Envisioning a different future, Adi Ashkenazi, who directs the economic research division of Israel's Office of Regional Co-operation under Minister for Regional Development Silvan Shalom, says Israel is supportive of the plans for Rawabi.

"Israel views with great importance assisting economic projects in the Palestinian Authority," Ashkenazi said. "We believe economic peace will improve our relations and help bring us to a place of dialogue and the real basis for the future."

Ashkenazi talked to JTA while en route to a ceremony to mark a new Israel-West Bank crossing point that will make it easier for Israeli Arabs to enter the northern West Bank city of Jenin and spend money, in the hopes that it will boost the local economy. Israeli Jews are not permitted to enter Palestinian cities.

Rawabi is to sit on Palestinian Authority-controlled land, but developers are still awaiting final Israeli approval for the building of an access road, part of which will be located near a road used by Jewish settlers that falls in an area under Israeli jurisdiction.

Palestinian economist Samir Hazboun sees the plans for Rawabi, which aims to attract educated, middle-class Palestinians, as a good sign.

"It show Palestinians' interest in investing and improving their own standard of living, and at the end of the day, will be a new example that something is moving toward the future," Hazboun said.

Rawabi was heralded at a conference last month in Jerusalem by British Jewish businessman Sir Ronald Cohen, who heads a non-profit that encourages political stability through Israeli and Palestinian economic development. The group, the Portland Trust, is helping support Rawabi.

Cohen says he sees the city as part of a larger effort to foster a more moderate Palestinian electorate.

"We have to support the private sector because it's the only way to have sustainable growth," Cohen said. "If people are feeling desperate, it's very hard to arrive at reasonable negotiations."

In Rawabi's promotional video, 3-D architectural images depict people walking in a modern city with gleaming high-rise buildings, green parks and shopping areas.

For now, the site of Rawabi remains one of wild sage tucked amid craggy, white rocks, rows of new cypress and pine trees, and a bumpy dirt road.

A young civil engineer who is part of its design team looks out at the view and says he hopes that one day soon, he'll be beyond planning the city – he'll be living in it.

British Jews use 'buycott' to combat boycott

JTA

LONDON — British Jews organized a "buycott" of Israeli products to combat a Palestinian boycott campaign against two major supermarket chains.

The Board of Deputies of British Jews and the Fair Play Campaign Group urged shoppers to buy as many Israeli products as possible last week in response to the Palestine Solidarity Campaign's targeting of Waitrose and Morrisons, reported the London Jewish Chronicle. Pro-Israel groups said a number of stores had almost sold out of their kosher products, including wine, fruit and herbs.

The Palestinian group urged supporters to write letters and deluge the supermarkets with phone calls, and also organized protests outside certain stores.

A Waitrose spokesperson told the Chronicle that the chain had experienced business as usual, while a Morrisons representative would not comment directly on the action, but said it carried products from a "wide range of suppliers around the world" so that its shoppers had choices.

Israeli is crazy about Canada

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

ROSH HA'AYIN, Israel — Atop Malka Levy-Kaiser's house in old Rosh Ha'ayin, a small city northeast of Petach Tikvah, three flags flutter in the wind: an Israeli, a Canadian, and one from the province of Nova Scotia.

Her living room is virtually a museum of Canadian arts and crafts: pairs of snowshoes and moccasins adorn the walls, along with maps of Canada, photographs and posters depicting proud aboriginal chiefs. A peace pipe dangles from the ceiling. Every shelf is packed with knick-knacks; statuettes of the Bluenose, lighthouses on key chains, dream catchers, wood carvings of grizzly bears and deer.

Malka Levy-Kaiser

An upstairs bedroom hosts another treasure-trove of Canadian souvenirs: books and calendars, beautifully beaded aboriginal dresses and a huge case of jewelry – earrings, necklaces and bracelets – all handmade First Nations crafts. In the closet is the pièce de résistance: a full and carefully preserved RCMP uniform.

So, what does a 57-year-old Israeli woman from Rosh Ha'ayin have to do with Canada? For starters, Levy-Kaiser has visited Canada for 11 consecutive years, except for the last three because her husband Maj.-Gen. Edmond (Eddie) Kaiser's illness and eventual death this past August. "My husband was suffering from cancer and couldn't make the trip," says Levy-Kaiser, with a tear. "I will go next year, once the year of my husband's memorial is up."

Kaiser, who was 20 years his wife's senior, introduced her to Canada. A Holocaust survivor, Kaiser came to Israel along with his parents and other relatives after the war. Shortly after their arrival, his family moved to Montreal.

He decided to stay in Israel. Levy-Kaiser says he played a key behind-the-scenes role in establishing the military of the fledgling state, thereafter taking a senior position in the Ministry of Defence. Upon his retirement, Kaiser volunteered with the Israel police, became the head of the Canadian Desk at the Israel section of the International Police Association and pursued a postgraduate degree in history at Tel Aviv University.

His main interest was Canada's First Nations, specifically the Mi'kmaq and their language. "Eddie felt a deep connection to these people, because he felt that they understood what it meant to be persecuted," says Levy-Kaiser. "To him, there was a thread that ran through his experience and theirs."

Another point of similarity, she says, is the great histories of both peoples – Jewish and First Nations alike. "My husband explained that a main difference between us was that we decided to write our history down in the Torah, whereas their history remained an exclusively oral tradition. Their history has been passed down in stories told from generation to generation."

It is these points of connection, along with the fact that the couple came from a faraway place, that gave them a sort of unique access into the Mi'kmaq world. "They are a very closed culture, but they didn't consider us a threat," says Levy-Kaiser, who is herself of Yemenite lineage. Her 18 years as a social worker, helping new immigrants to Israel from Ethiopia acclimatize, may also have come in handy in making the Mi'kmaq comfortable with them.

Her favourite memory of her time with them was the evening a Mi'kmaq chief invited her to participate in a special dance ceremony. At the end, he let her keep the tomahawk she had used in the ceremony. "I felt really honoured," she says, pointing to the tomahawk on the wall. "I keep it here, where I can see it all the time."

What began as a series of visits for the purpose of Kaiser's research quickly became a strong personal friendship. Soon, the Kaisers were coming every year to celebrate Mi'kmaq History Month (on Oct. 1), spending two months of each year in Middleton, N.S., a small town in the Annapolis Valley, halfway between Halifax and Yarmouth. From there, they took trips to visit friends on various reserves in the area, and went on tours of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and to Montreal, where they visited Kaiser's family.

"Canada is a beautiful country," says Levy-Kaiser. "The people are so nice, and we have so many friends there. My favourite place is Nova Scotia. That's where my heart is."

"This Christmas, I will be sending 20 packages from Israel to my friends in Nova Scotia," she says. Over the last three years, she has missed them and has written many letters to stay in touch. In return, she receives packages full of the treasures that adorn the shelves and walls of her Canadian museum/house.

Clement visits Israel for trade talks

Compiled by CJN Staff

TEL AVIV — Industry Minister Tony Clement was in Israel from Nov. 14 to 18 for five days of meetings on Canada–Israel trade relations and developments in the field of water technologies.

"This year marks the 60th anniversary of relations between our two countries and the 12th anniversary of the Canada–Israel Free Trade Agreement," Clement said in a statement before leaving for the region last week. "I am hoping that our visit may lead to even closer co-operation and serve to demonstrate to companies [in Israel] that Canada is a good place to do business."

One of the trip highlights was Clement's attendance at the International Water Technologies, Renewable Energy and Environmental Control Exhibition (WATEC), where he was slated to address the conference on Canada's domestic and international initiatives in the field of water technologies.

Clement was also scheduled to meet Israeli industry and government officials to discuss issues in a number of key sectors, including communications technology, biotechnology, aerospace and defence.

He was also slated to discuss bilateral trade opportunities with Israel's minister of industry, trade and labour, Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, and travel to Jerusalem to visit the Yissum Research Development Company, Hebrew University of Jerusalem's technology transfer firm.

Clement was also scheduled to attend a roundtable on Israel's innovation strategy and travel to Haifa to tour the Intel Development Design Center, one of the company's largest research and design facilities.

His evening visit to Haifa on Nov. 16 was timed to coincide with the arrival of HMCS Fredericton, a Canadian frigate en route to patrol duties in the Persian Gulf. At a ceremony aboard the naval vessel, he was to host a reception to mark the 100-day countdown to the opening of the Vancouver 2010 Olympic and Paralympic Winter Games.

Clement was also scheduled to visit Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial, where he was to lay a wreath.

HARVEY FIERSTEIN TO REPLACE TOPOL IN FIDDLER ON THE ROOF

Chaim Topol, the 74-year-old Israeli-born actor who had been scheduled to play Tevye in the touring production of Fiddler on the Roof that is slated to open in Toronto in December, has been forced to bow out of the show after suffering a shoulder injury requiring emergency treatment, the show's producers have announced.

However, in the best "show must go on" tradition, the producers have enlisted actor Harvey Fierstein to play Tevye as he did in the 2005 Broadway production. "He's pretty good, giving a performance that is expansive, affectionate and full of feeling," Internet theatre critic Michael Kuchwara commented of Fierstein's performance at the time.

Topol, of course, had "tradition" on his side, having played the role more than 2,500 times over the last 45 years, including an Oscar-nominated performance in the 1971 film version. The Boston Globe noted that he "now looks more like the grandfather than the father of Tevye's three headstrong daughters" but had still managed to turn that to his advantage.

Mirvish Productions is presenting the musical, which reproduces the original choreography by Jerome Robbins, at Toronto's Canon Theatre from Dec. 8 to Jan. 10, 2010.

David Mirvish said in a prepared statement that he was shocked to hear of Topol's injury, but that his "shock turned to delight" the moment he heard that Fierstein would take over the role. "Mr. Fierstein is not only a brilliant writer, but a magnificent performer, a genuine Broadway star whom we look forward to welcoming to Toronto," he said. 416-872-1212, www.mirvish.com

Neshama Carlebach and gospel choir make stirring spiritual music

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, the remarkably talented, much-beloved, charismatic and influential teacher, balladeer, singer, musician, died 15 years ago. His yahrzeit was commemorated earlier this month on Nov. 3, the 16th day of the month of Cheshvan.

Were he alive today, Reb Shlomo would surely qvell with mountainous peaks of fatherly happiness that his daughter, Neshama, sings so pointedly, so purposefully and so beautifully to a needy world.

Neshama Carlebach

Mentored in music, rabbinics and life by her late father but now fully writing her own, distinct musical story, Neshama is answering to her own personally infused commitment to extending the reach and the meaning of music. The young, powerful singer has just released her seventh CD, Higher and Higher, (Sojourn Records Sony). Neshama's latest CD is so very different from the preceding six!

It is an inspired initiative by Neshama that brings the magical, ethereal sweep of her father's music to different groups and cultures as well as to new audiences of her own generation who seek, perhaps through music, pathways to a realm of communal belonging thus far closed to them.

Higher and Higher is a collaboration with Rev. Roger Hambrick and the Green Pastures Baptist Choir of the Bronx, N.Y. Together, Neshama, Rev. Hambrick and the choir have created an electrifying, thoughtful, moving and very large work of Jewish gospel music that interprets the familiar song-prayers of her late father, Reb Shlomo.

The 10 tracks on the CD are a unique blending of chassidish, gospel, jazz, yeshivish, blues, folk and old-time, spiritual revival music. Some songs reverberate with exceptional heart-pounding force and energy; others caress tenderly.

This is spiritual mood music at his highest and absorbing meditation at its deepest.

Though already familiar with the tunes, this listener was rocked by the new renditions. For example, Hu Elukeinu begins with the deliberate, almost mournful singing by Neshama. But it quickly picks up speed and emotion when the choir joins her. The song then changes from a single person's affirmation to a rallying cry of optimism and hope.

Higher and Higher, the song that gives the CD its title, is a musical ladder of introspection and motivation on which the listener ascends as though walking on waves of musical air.

Brothers and Friends takes a familiar shul tune into an entirely new realm of liturgical harmonies. The combination of the Shlomo niggun (melody) and the rich, expansive sound of the full gospel choir, in truth, effectively creates a new musical form that is profoundly affecting.

In addition to the innovative musical arrangements, the songs feature voices that are an auditory celebration. Neshama's voice, more familiar to us, is by turns, velvety, husky and always sensual. It combines with the choir soloists, Rev. Hambrick, Vanessa Hambrick, Ajanee Hambrick and Q Smith whose voices, individually and collectively, cover the entire range of vocal extension. The result is sensational.

"Music can somehow break our hearts and allow us to feel so whole all at the same time," Neshama writes on her website. She might have had this CD in mind when she wrote those words.

The final track Ki Va Moed opens with the broad multi-part harmonies so typical of gospel, of foot-stomping, shoulder-shaking, hand-clapping gospel music. The opening bars hold our attention by the sheer force of the enveloping harmony. Then the music soars to even more potent harmonies, guitar riffs, single voice solos and a throbbing, catchy beat. The song invites the listener to turn up the volume as high as possible, shut one's eyes, and sway in upbeat unison with the hopeful, optimism that reverberates from the song.

"Somehow, when we don't have the words to express all that we need, music says it for us," Neshama writes.

The music of Higher and Higher are the "words" that fail us when hope wanes in an often dangerous and discouraging world. Listening to Neshama and the choir is an emotional experience, at times even overwhelming for the sense of promise that it evokes in us about the possibilities of goodness and purpose that abound in our world.

If you like to sing along, clap your hands to the beat, weave and bob to the rhythm, sway to the roll of the music or simply let the poetry of song-prayers wash over and through you, then this CD is for you. And if you are seeking a transportive experience, it will take you higher and higher.

A unique orchestral experience...continuing the proud tradition of mandolin music in the Jewish, Ukrainian and other communities

Mia Farrow endorses campaign on Darfur advocacy

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Actor and humanitarian Mia Farrow has endorsed another Canadian Jewish organization working to raise awareness about the genocide in the Darfur region of Sudan.

Farrow, who has starred in more than 40 films including Rosemary's Baby and Hannah and Her Sisters, is a children's rights advocate as a UNICEF Goodwill Ambassador and a Darfur activist. She sat with The CJN last week to talk about her support for the Darfur Action Committee, a Canadian Jewish Congress initiative.

Farrow was in Toronto on Nov. 8 to speak about the need for people to do their utmost to alleviate the suffering of the helpless and voiceless around the world at an annual awards ceremony called Starry Nights, hosted by Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

Moments before the event was to begin, Farrow took time to talk about the CJC campaign on Darfur advocacy, which is led by Ottawa-based lawyer Amichai Wise, as well as volunteers, including university students, professionals and religious leaders from across the country.

CJC presented a 44-page booklet, titled Darfur: A Jewish Response, that it plans to distribute to synagogues, university campuses and community centres across Canada. The book, which draws on Jewish texts to motivate Canadians to advocate for the victims in Darfur by providing specific advocacy ideas, is also available for downloading as a PDF at www.cjc.ca/darfur.

Although the book appeals specifically to the Jewish community, Farrow said that it hasn't even been necessary to appeal to Jews to advocate for the victims of Darfur because they have been part of the campaign from the start.

"The response of the Jewish community in America, in England, here in Canada has been immediate and everybody stepped up, and it's just amazing. Without Jewish advocacy in America, we wouldn't have the Save Darfur Coalition, we wouldn't have the STAND [Students Taking Action Now: Darfur] groups – we wouldn't have anywhere near the focus that we have been able to shed on another genocide," Farrow said.

"And, of course, it is because of the Jewish people, who tragically know better than anyone, when we say the word genocide… what it means. It is the Jewish community again and again who have stepped up," she said.

Going even further with her praise of the Jewish community, she called herself a "Jewish wannabe," and added that she "always wanted to be Jewish."

Wise, chair of the Darfur Action Committee, said, "Jews understand more than anyone, perhaps, why being a bystander is not an appropriate stance to take.

"All of my grandparents are Holocaust survivors, so for me, it is just part of my outlook to not be a bystander and speak up," he added.

The book also includes graphic images from the region, including a photo taken by Farrow during one of her 11 trips to the region.

Farrow took her first trip to Darfur in 2004, about a year after a conflict over land between African farmers and Arabic nomads began. The conflict escalated into a violent war between African guerrilla groups and the Janjaweed, which led to the murder of hundreds of thousands and the displacement of about three million people in refugee camps, some of whom are dying from hunger and disease.

Farrow said that books such as Darfur: A Jewish Response are so important because "to reach the governments you have to get to the citizens.

"I'm of a generation that stopped a war. We took to the streets and stopped a war," she said, referring to the Vietnam War. "But that's because our voices were heard. We just have to raise our voices."

Mia Farrow spoke about the importance of distributing literature such as Canadian Jewish Congress' Darfur: A Jewish Response to galvanize citizens to advocate for the victims of the Darfur genocide.

She spoke about a late American senator, Paul Simon, who said that if just 100 people from each congressional district had written or called their leadership about the Rwandan genocide in 1994, the American government would have intervened.

Farrow urges people to call a toll-free number, 1-800-Genocid(e), that connects you directly to the office of the Canadian prime minister, the office of the foreign affairs minister, or the office of the opposition.

"You don't have to be an expert, you just have to say, 'I want my government to step up. It is not acceptable to watch millions of people perish.'"

Farrow, who said her family motto is that with knowledge comes responsibility, said that the first step in becoming an advocate is to get informed.

"[Ask yourself] what is being demanded of you, what is in your sphere of capabilities to give, to do, to join, to become involved, to lend your voice."

She said that while she has gotten discouraged in the past by people's apathy, she has a lot of hope when it comes to the younger generation of activists.

"I get down sometimes. I don't indulge in it and I don't allow it for long, but sometimes I wake up feeling depressed that it is such an uncaring world, but I went to We Day, that the Kielburgers [put together]," Farrow said, referring to an annual event in Toronto and Vancouver conceived by children rights activists Craig and Marc Kielburger to empower youth to make positive change in the world.

"I've been two years in a row. I can't feel anything but hopeful when you see 20,000 young people saying, 'Yes, we can!' Each time I tell them, 'You are the generation I've been waiting for,' they scream, 'Yes, we are!' Canadians are on fire. I'd like to see that in America."

Improbable love animates Israeli film Strangers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Strangers, a film by Erez Tadmor and Guy Nattiv, focuses on a fleeting friendship in the context of a yawning political difference.

It's due to be screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on Sunday, Nov. 22 at 5 p.m. at the Sheppard Grande as part of the festival's Chai Tea + A Movie series.

Eyal (Liron Levo), an Israeli backpacker and a kibbutznik, arrives in Germany on the eve of the World Cup. It's the summer of 2006. He phones his German girlfriend, but she doesn't take his call.

In a chance encounter on a subway train, he meets Rana (Lubna Azabal), a secular Palestinian from Ramallah who lives in Paris.

They seem attracted to each other, notwithstanding the ever-present politics of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

At a football match, they bond, kissing in public. Their growing intimacy is interrupted by Rana's decision to leave Germany. "It won't work between us," Rana says as she bids Eyal goodbye. Only later do we learn why she's been summoned to Paris.

Somehow, Eyal tracks her down in Paris and they reconnect. At this point, the war in Lebanon has broken out and he discovers that Rana has an illegitimate son and is in France illegally.

Facing a medical emergency, Rana finds out that she can depend only on Eyal, whom she barely knows, rather than on her old friends.

Grateful for his loyalty and his affinity for her son, she asks him to stay on as her "guest."

Lubna Azabal and Liron Levo encounter each other in Strangers

But a brief conversation with some of Rana's anti-Israel friends leaves a bitter taste in his mouth, while a long-distance phone call from his father informs him that he has been mobilized by the Israeli army.

Should he fulfil his duty as a soldier or remain in Paris with Rana? That's the question Eyal must answer as the war drags on.

Strangers turns an improbable situation into a fairly plausible one, but the film shifts awkwardly between scenes. The acting, however, is credible.

Evan Solomon hosts new CBC news show

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Only 15 minutes into a media interview and already Evan Solomon's voice reaches a fever pitch when he's talking politics.

It's obvious the CBC journalist and host relishes the opportunity to dive deep into the stories on Parliament Hill in his new CBC show Power & Politics, running 5 to 7 p.m. on CBC NN (formerly Newsworld).

"We're expanding the notion of what politics means to people," Solomon says in an interview from his new office in Ottawa. "We won't just cover the Hill but also how we interact with the rest of world, with businesses, with NGOs. Let's be honest, buying a cup of organic coffee is a political statement, since that kind of act touches so many lives."

The show's format will be interview-heavy, but Solomon stresses the importance of allowing everyday Canadians to make an appearance. He says Power & Politics will not just feature the major players in Ottawa, but also allow the public to interact with the show in real-time, either via the web or other social media routes.

"We want more Canadians to be part of this conversation," Solomon, 41, adds.

The former anchor of CBC News: Sunday welcomes the new makeover CBC launched recently. He appreciates the commitment to current affairs programming, especially during this period of economic instability. "CBC is investing in news, and every Canadian should be excited about that," he says.

He says Canadians don't realize how much news is going on around them, and he thinks his show will help sort out all of the noise.

Before joining the anchor desk at CBC News: Sunday, Solomon hosted Hot Type, the CBC Newsworld show about print culture. He has also been front and centre with new media trends, hosting a show called FutureWorld and co-founding the now-defunct tech magazine Shift. He also wrote and edited the 2004 book, Fueling the Future: How the Battle Over Energy Will Change Everything.

With his appointment as host of Power & Politics comes a big move to the nation's capital. Solomon and his wife and two children left the friends and family of Toronto to make a new home in Ottawa.

"Moving is not easy, but this is a dream opportunity I couldn't pass up," Solomon says.

What does he think of his new Jewish community in Ottawa?

"The congregation at Temple Israel welcomed us warmly, so we are delighted to find a community here."

Fresh evidence of synagogue influence on American popular music

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

"There may be trouble ahead," begins Irving Berlin's famed 1936 song, Let's Face the Music and Dance, and if you are a fan of the classic American songbook and singers, you can easily hear Fred Astaire singing that line in your head.

The song is remarkable, according to author David Lehman in A Fine Romance, because it puts all the usual clichés about moonlight and romance in a new and ominous light. After the " fiddlers have fled," there'll be " teardrops to shed" and we'll have to pay the bill. Berlin was alluding, of course, to all the trouble breaking in Germany, Spain, Italy and the rest of Europe, even as he urged Americans to face the music and dance. "That double meaning is a grand example of Berlin's wizardry: he doesn't avoid cliches, he embraces them and gives them new life," Lehman comments.

There are many such sparkling insights in Lehman's A Fine Romance: Jewish Songwriters, American Songs, newly published by Nextbook Schocken Press of New York. Lehman writes with immense knowledge about the great Jewish composers of the legendary American songbook, including such geniuses as Berlin, Harold Arlen, Jerome Kern, Oscar Hammerstein, Dorothy Fields, Sammy Cahn, and George and Ira Gershwin. Cole Porter, who once said he tried to "write Jewish tunes," is also included, as are a host of performers from Al Jolson to Frank Sinatra, Ethel Merman to Judy Garland to Barbra Streisand.

Lehman has such intimate knowledge of his subject matter that he has taken to writing fantastically about some of these figures, calling them his uncles, and describing others as they appeared to him in dreams and imaginary conversations. Yet despite such dubious devices and the maddeningly rambling prose style, A Fine Romance offers enough biographical and historical context to make the reading experience worthwhile – even irresistible for fans of American popular music in the half-century after Berlin scored a colossal hit with Alexander's Ragtime Band in 1911. (Once, when asked to describe Berlin's place in American music, Kern observed: "Irving Berlin has no 'place' in American music. Irving Berlin is American music.").

Lehman provides plenty of fresh evidence of the influence of the synagogue on American popular music. For example, consider the George Gershwin song It Ain't Necessarily So from the famed Porgy and Bess opera. Lehman was certain he had heard the musical phrase for the words "it ain't necessarily so" somewhere before: then he remembered where it had been. "It was at the bima on Shabbos, when a congregant is summoned to recite a blessing over the Torah," he writes. "Borchu es adoshem hamvorach. Hear it?"

There are also suggestions that the phrase "morning time and evenin' time" from Gershwin's Bess You Is My Woman Now came from the Ma Nishtanah, the four questions of the Passover seder. And the characteristic mingling of minor-note intonations into melodies constructed of sweet major chords is regarded as a typically Jewish innovation, again reminding listeners of a pleasant love ballad that "there may be trouble ahead."

Arlen's father was a cantor in Buffalo who often sang the Shabbat prayers to his son's melodies. "According to accounts I have read, the songs he favoured for Sabbath services included Over the Rainbow and Come Rain or Come Shine," Lehman writes. "I sometimes wonder if, when dancing with the Torah – or perhaps on Purim – he ever chanted to the tune of Ding Dong the Witch is Dead."

Lehman's idiosyncratic prose notwithstanding, A Fine Romance should make an enjoyable diversion for anyone who carries many of these tunes in his or her head – or iPod.

Beautiful Losers and The Favourite Game by Leonard Cohen.

Leonard Cohen published only two novels – The Favourite Game in 1963 and Beautiful Losers in 1966. The first is a loosely autobiographical account of the youth and early manhood of the only son of an old Jewish family in Montreal. The second focuses on an effervescent and uninhibited love triangle that also features a 17-century Mohawk saint.

Now, in the year in which Cohen marks his 75th birthday, the Toronto-based publishing house McClelland and Stewart has issued an attractive volume containing both novels. It is refreshingly devoid of any intellectual packaging: no professor pre-empting the novels with a critical appreciation, no clumsy footnotes cluttering the text, no scholarly afterward.

Cohen wrote these novels as part of the '60s "new wave" of writers that threw off the conventions and moral restrictions of the past. They reveal him as an iconoclastic, bohemian and Byronic voice effused in a poetic sensibility. Those who read these novels years ago as mass-market paperbacks may enjoy revisiting them in this respectable hardcover format. To those who have never read them before, an entertaining treat awaits.

Two by the Tregebovs

Is it just my imagination or does there seem to be some strange correspondence between the titles of the two novels that came out recently by two ex-Winnipeggers both sharing the same last name? Rhea Tregebov's The Knife Sharpener's Bell is published by Coteau Books and Michael Tregebov's The Briss is from New Star Books. (A knife is implicit, but not present, in both titles.) The Knife Sharpener's Bell focuses on a Jewish family that attempts to escape the worst of the Great Depression by returning from Winnipeg back to the Soviet Union in the 1930s. The opening chapters are engaging with good use of language, as one might expect from Rhea Tregebov, an oft-published poet now living in Vancouver.

The Briss features a Jewish medical-school dropout who crosses into forbidden territory while on a Birthright Israel tour and enters into a relationship with a Palestinian woman, making her pregnant. Michael Tregebov lives in Barcelona, Spain, where he works as a translator.

Josephine the Singer by Franz Kafka

Karin Doerr, Barbara Galli and Gary Evans have jointly produced a new translation of Franz Kafka's Josephine the Singer, or The Nation of the Mice, which was recently published in chapbook format by the Concordia University Chair in Canadian Jewish studies. Doerr's scholarly afterword provides an interpretative key to this oblique and highly allegorical piece of writing (I hesitate to call it a story) that asserts that Kafka was actually writing about his Jewish identity.

Israel & the Jewish World

'Iron-clad security needed'

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Only a strong Israel can attain peace, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said in Washington, D.C., last week.

"But even a strong Israel is a small Israel," he told more than 3,000 people Nov. 9 at the Jewish Federations of North America's General Assembly.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netabyahu addressed the General Assembly last week.

"The U.S. and Canada are roughly 400 times each the size of Israel. The Arab world is 500 times the size of Israel. Even Jordan is almost four times as big," he said. "Because of our small size and the radical and violent neighbourhood in which we live, Israel faces security threats like that of no other nation."

During his speech, Netanyahu outlined several of his goals for Israel, which included stopping Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons, decreasing Israel's dependence on oil and signing a peace deal with the Palestinians.

"Peace between Israel and our Arab neighbours… would spare our children the horrors of war," he said, adding that he's willing to negotiate with Palestinian leaders.

"I want to make this clear: my goal is not negotiation for negotiation's sake. My goal is to reach a peace treaty, and soon," he said.

Netanyahu's vision of peace includes a demilitarized Palestinian state and a Jewish state recognized by the Palestinian government, he said.

"Even after we achieve peace, it may take years for the spirit of peace to permeate most levels of Palestinian society… Any peace agreement we sign today must include iron-clad security measures."

Rahm Emanuel, the White House chief of staff, speaking the next day, said that U.S. President Barack Obama understands Israel's position and will stand by the country.

"As the president said in Cairo, Egypt, the bond of the United States and Israel is unbreakable," he said.

Obama was supposed to speak at the GA, but Emanuel spoke in his place after Obama withdrew to attend a memorial service for the 13 people killed by a gunman at the U.S Army base in Fort Hood, Texas.

Obama met with Netanyahu and a group of leaders from the Jewish Federations last Monday. According to Emanuel, it was "a very positive meeting."

"I'm absolutely confident that Prime Minister Netanyahu understands deeply the strategic importance of moving this peace process forward," Emanuel said.

An essential part of the peace process is negotiation without preconditions, Emanuel added.

In his speech, he addressed concerns among some observers that the Obama administration is not supportive of Israel.

"There are those who would question that this administration has sought to… open up dialogue with Israel's neighbours and with Muslim nations around the world," he said, mentioning the fear that this will come at Israel's expense.

"That is not the intent, and that is not the case and never will be," he said. "It is just the opposite, for it is only through dialogue that we can achieve [the] lasting peace that Israel seeks."

Young Jews vital: Sharansky

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The younger generation is the key to a strong Israel, said Natan Sharansky last week at the Jewish Federations of North America's General Assembly in Washington, D.C..

Sharansky, a human rights activist from the former Soviet Union and the chairman of the executive of the Jewish Agency for Israel, spoke to a crowd of around 3,000 people about the 20th anniversary of the fall of the Berlin Wall.

"The battle which we are facing today is the battle for our identity," he said. "Today Israel is strong, but … our aim must be to connect every young Jew with Israel and to connect Israel with every Jewish community in the world."

While fighting for human rights and freedom in the Soviet Union, Sharansky was often asked to choose between universalism and nationalism, he said.

"Are you fighting for the human rights of all the world or for the rights of your people?… In fact, I never felt that I had to decide, not only because I enjoyed both of these values, but because I always felt, I believed, that these two struggles were connected," he said. "The struggle for freedom and identity is the same struggle."

After the end of the Cold War, the collapse of the Soviet Union and the fall of the Berlin Wall, Sharansky believes that Jews are now being asked the same question.

"Today we live in the global, post-national, post-modern, post-identity world where people… again are asked to make a choice between universalism and nationalism. Between freedom and identity," he said. "If we insist on being part of a Jewish state, doesn't it make a mockery of our larger Jewish ideals?… Do we really want to [place] ourselves in a Jewish cocoon of a state?"

These questions, said Sharansky, lead to assimilation and the erosion of Jewish identity.

"And then the most awful thing happens, a young Jew… finally says, 'Enough. I want to live in the world without Israel.'"

The key, he told the audience, which was made up of Jewish groups from throughout North America, is to build strong Jewish communities around the world. –R.P.

Rabbi in training takes world boxing title

By YEHOSHUA SAGI
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

SAN FRANCISCO — Yuri Foreman late Saturday night became the first Israeli to claim a professional boxing crown when he defeated Daniel Santos of Puerto Rico to take the WBA junior middleweight (under-70 kilogram) title on points.

Foreman, a Belarus-born Israeli who has lived in Brooklyn for 10 years and is studying to be an Orthodox rabbi, won the 12-round bout by unanimous decision – 116-110, 117-109 and 117-10.

The 29-year-old Foreman was so excited after his victory that a few minutes after midnight he called his father in Haifa from his MGM Grand Hotel suite in Las Vegas to give him the big news.

"Before I entered the ring my wife, Leyla, told me: 'Yuri, can I ask you something? Do me a favour, finish it quickly with a knockout.'I knew why she asked me this, I knew it's hard for her to see me in a fight long enough to take several blows. I also thought I wanted to end it with a knockout," Foreman told his father.

He also told his father how he prayed and said Pslams until he had his rival on the ropes, losing his balance. "I saw him wobbling," he said. "I knew another blow or two and I would send him to the floor and win with a knockout, but then the bell sounded, ending the round and saving him."

Foreman is a rare combination of power and smarts. He comes from a poor family that immigrated to Israel after the collapse of the Soviet Union. His father works in Haifa as a mechanic, but Yuri moved to New York nearly a decade ago. A few years later, he began studying in a Brooklyn yeshiva to become an Orthodox rabbi.

He has a strict schedule, studying Torah in the morning and doing intense physical training both inside and out of the ring in the afternoon. He does a lot of weight lifting, running and fitness training.

The transplanted Brooklynite took a 27-0 record into the title fight, while Santos boasted a record of 32 wins – 23 by knockout, three losses and one draw. Going into the fight, Santos was considered a boxer with vision, power and great stamina.

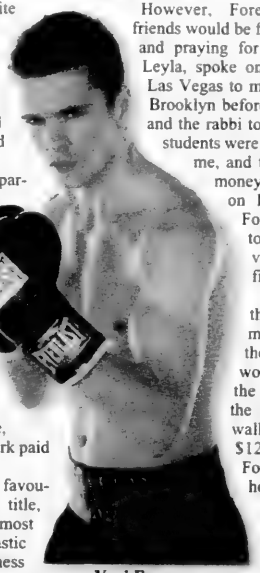
Foreman said that in preparing for the southpaw he knew that if he could stand his ground, the Puerto Rican would not be able to knock him out. "So I worked hard for months to be at the peak of fitness," he said. "They were very exhausting, difficult months to both study for the rabbinate and practice, but now I know the hard work paid off and proved itself."

Although Santos was the favourite to defend his world title, Foreman had the edge almost the entire way with fantastic legwork, showing that fitness and a lot of courage did not succumb to Santos' physical superiority.

"It's a fact we had 12 tough rounds, but thank God every time I got back into the ring for more I said prayers in my heart, and it worked," he said after the fight. "If you ask me what my strength is, I'll tell you it's in my brain. I run around the ring and keep thinking. I think I need to prove to everyone, not just myself, to the whole world that Jews know how to fight, that Jews know how to give a good fight and not surrender.

"I said it right after the fight, when they pushed the microphones at me and the cameras clicked. I said I wanted to prove that Jews are not a weak people that can be made to bend down and surrender, that Jews know how to fight and win. Actually, there are a lot of Jewish champions in the history of sports."

The place was packed, as the fight was on the undercard of the Manny Pacquiao-Miguel Cotto title fight at the MGM Grand Garden Arena. With tickets, which were a minimum of $200 (all figures US), picked up weeks in advance, it's no wonder none of Foreman's yeshiva buddies made it to cheer him on. Moreover, the event was held just after Shabbat ended.



Yuri Foreman

However, Foreman knew his friends would be following the fight and praying for him. "My wife, Leyla, spoke on the phone from Las Vegas to my rosh yeshiva in Brooklyn before the fight began, and the rabbi told her that all the students were saying Psalms for me, and they paid a lot of money to see my fight on Direct TV," said Foreman, referring to the $55 pay-per-view price of the fight.

In contrast to the usual arrangement in which the winner of the world crown takes the lion's share of the winnings, Santos walked away with $123,750, while Foreman only took home $41,250.

"It was arranged before the fight that the champ would get 60 per cent of the proceeds and I would get 40 per cent," Foreman explained. "But it doesn't matter much because in the next bout I'll come into the ring as world champion, and then I'll get the majority and my rival will have to settle for a smaller share."

Foreman said after the fight that he was hungry, tired and just wanted to rest. "I want to forget about boxing for a few good weeks," he said. "Later we'll start planning the next move. Now I want to enjoy a little quiet when I can dedicate myself to my rabbinic studies and enjoy having a world crown."

Barring any surprises, Foreman expects to finish his rabbinic studies within a year, at which point he will be ordained. "I think it would be most fitting for me to return to Israel and be a rabbi for a community there," he said. "I could leave Israel once in a while to box."

Volunteer honoured for going 'beyond the call of duty'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Shirley Brazer, a longtime Baycrest volunteer, is one of 20 seniors who were awarded the Ontario Senior Achievement Award, honouring people who have made outstanding contributions to their communities after turning 65.

She received the award at a recent ceremony at the Lieutenant Governor's Suite at Queen's Park for her work with Baycrest's seniors support program, where she has made friendly telephone visits since 1997.

Program co-ordinator Leslie Patterson said she nominated Brazer for the award – the first time she has nominated anyone – "because she has the ability to see beyond the boundaries of the program, she challenges us to think of ways to improve our service, and she is a tremendous advocate for the clients she calls regularly."

One result of Brazer's advocacy, said Patterson, is the scent-free policy that now exists at Baycrest. "She was aware that some people at the centre are sensitive to scent, and she challenged us to do something about it. It took two years, but the whole facility is now scent-free."

Patterson said that although Brazer insists she "only planted the seed to get the policy going, she checked constantly to see if that seed was being watered."

Shirley Brazer is presented with the Ontario Senior Achievement Award by Lieutenant Governor of Ontario David Onley.

Brazer, who goes to Baycrest once a week to call about eight clients, was a librarian who completed a post-graduate diploma in gerontology when she was in her 50s.

"It is a friendly visit, and some clients need longer calls than others. It's good for all of us. I enjoy calling them, and they appreciate the calls," Brazer said.

Patterson said that on many occasions, Brazer has gone "beyond the call of duty" for her clients.

"One recent example involved a client who had no relatives or friends, and was living alone at risk," Patterson said.

"Shirley brought the situation to the attention of our staff, and over several months, the woman was helped by several agencies. She eventually moved to a facility."

Patterson added that when the woman didn't have a personal phone for several months, Brazer wrote her notes of encouragement. "This woman told me that she doesn't know what she would have done without her," Patterson said.

"Shirley tries to get things done without overstepping. She's not a social worker, but she doesn't let things rest."

Brazer said that she was impressed with the quality of the volunteers who received the award. "One is 90 years old, and they were not all physically mobile. The important thing is that they were of service. They do what they can do. They don't focus on their limitations."

CRANBERRY-RAISIN DESSERT LATKES

12 oz bag cranberries
3/4 c water
3/4 c raisins
1/2 c. orange juice
2 c. sugar
1 c. flour
2 eggs, beaten
canola or peanut oil

In a large pot, simmer cranberries in water until they pop. Add raisins, orange juice & sugar. Mix well, then boil until mixture is thick about 15 min. Let cool. Add flour and eggs to cranberry mixture and blend well. In a large skillet, heat oil over a low heat. Drop batter in by tablespoons, flatten with spoon. Turn when latkes are golden, but keep turning often. Because of all the sugar, these latkes will burn easily. Latkes are ready in about 20 min. when both sides are golden brown, but soft. Drain on paper towels and serve.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My daughter-in-law Stacy is clearly a hypochondriac, and now with the H1N1 scare, she's gone into overdrive.

Steve and Stacy have two children – my grandchildren! She's making them nuts. They are six and eight years old, and she doesn't let them be normal kids. She's constantly taking their hands away from their faces, and she keeps them away from birthday parties and play dates. She walks around with hand sanitizer and repeatedly wipes their little hands, sometimes two or three times an hour. She's making them crazy, and I'm afraid she's going to turn them into little nervous nuts like her. I've tried to tell her that kids will be kids and she can't protect them every second, but her answer is, "I'm their mother and I have to do what's best for them."

My point is that she's doing more harm than good. How do I get through to her?

Germ Junkie

Dear Germ Junkie?

The media has been relentless with its coverage of H1N1. They scare people out of their wits with their depiction of grieving parents whose healthy children were victims of H1N1. They fuel the most basic instinct every parent has: the protection of their children. It's enough to send any normal parent into a state of paranoia. The question is, have some parents gone to far? We have read, and possibly been part of, long lineups to vaccinate against this flu. Is that over the top? I don't think so. It's a one-time sacrifice that's not likely to leave any kind of lasting impression. However, keeping children away from their friends and constantly reminding them to stay germ-free is another story.

You're right to be concerned about the emotional and possible long-lasting effect that Stacy's actions may have, but do you have a right to stop her? You certainly have a right to take her aside and try to explain the bigger picture and what her actions today may be predisposing the kids to down the road. Perhaps suggest she have a chat with their pediatrician and ask the doctor for guidelines. Explain that the children are in school and she can't watch them there, so keeping them away from their friends doesn't make logical sense. Be sensitive and don't preach. She's a loving mother doing the best she can at a difficult time.

How to judge to the good

I want to thank all of the readers who sent letters and e-mails and called after my last column, on finding bliss in challenging times. Your kindness, support, suggestions and positive energy were greatly appreciated.

A gentleman who enjoyed the column asked if I would consider devoting an entire column to the concept of "judging to the good." The concept is often taught by an incredible author, parenting coach and family counsellor Sarah Chana Radcliffe, who among many other books wrote Raise Your Kids Without Raising Your Voice. (www.parenting-advice.net).

Life Coach Corner
By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

Radcliffe, who is truly a benevolent being, spends a lot of time on the concept of "judging to the good," which she describes in the following way: "Judging to the good usually means when you're looking at people, the human brain is always working and judging favourably or negatively. It is actually a commandment from the Torah to judge favourably and fairly. It relates to the concept also of having a good eye that is looking at things in the most positive light. God wants us to be happy, and you can't be happy if you are thinking dark, negative thoughts."

Says Radcliffe, "Let's say you were in a situation where somebody was late for an appointment. You are going to imagine why they are late. They were supposed to show up and they didn't. The concept of fair judgment is that unless this person has a track record of neglecting to call you, it's not fair to assume the worst. It's not fair to assume they were sloppy or neglectful unless they have a track record."

Radcliffe also suggests an excellent book called The Other Side of the Story: Giving People The Benefit of the Doubt by Yehudis Samet, and she says, "That book is totally about how to judge people favourably and how to train your brain on how to consider all sorts of positive explanations to explain people's behaviours. It's really an amazing book. It explains if a person has been late or neglectful three or four times, then you're not obligated to make up positive excuses for why they have been late. What you can do is to still judge them positively, but know that in this one area, the person has a weakness that isn't their fault. It's just this one thing; you're not wiping them out."

So what is the spiritual concept in all of this?

"The spiritual concept is, the exact way we judge others is the way we will be judged on the day of our judgment. If we are very strict with others, God will be strict with us. Whereas if we try to make excuses for others, God will make excuses for us," Radcliffe says.

Rabbi Kalman Packouz, in The Six Questions: A Guide to Judging Favorably, writes, "Sometimes we jump to the wrong conclusion because the facts are different from what we perceive them to be. Even if our facts are accurate, we often misinterpret the intent behind them. When we drop the assumption that there was a negative intention behind someone's actions towards us, we automatically deflate much of the anger and hurt that we feel."

However, Rabbi Packouz adds that "although the Torah requires us to judge others with favour and compassion, we are not required to accept abusive behaviour from others. Physical, verbal or emotional abuse must be addressed and corrected."

In conclusion, Samet says it well, when she writes: "It is always important to try to judge favourably." Before we bang down the gavel, we must always challenge the evidence.

Sharansky fights Jewish apathy

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Natan Sharansky fought against the Communist regime in his native Soviet Union in the 1970s. Now, as the new chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel, he's fighting something different: Jewish apathy.

"Jews in the free world have no interest in Israel… I [have been] on 70 different campuses. I can't say that the situation here [in Toronto] is much worse, I also can't say it's much better," he said in an exclusive interview over breakfast at a downtown Toronto hotel. "We're facing many hostile demonstrations, and liberal Jews who believe that because they're Jews, they have to be the first to condemn Israel."

Sharansky, a human rights activist and former Israeli cabinet minister, visited Toronto last weekend to meet with Jewish organizations, including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

He said his goal as chair of the Jewish Agency, which has helped more than three million Jews immigrate to Israel since it was founded, is to help youth in the Diaspora strengthen their Jewish identity. This is being done through programs such as MASA Israel Journey, which Sharansky wants to expand. MASA enables young Jews from all over the world to spend a semester to a year in Israel on any of over 160 programs. He also hopes to increase the number of high school trips to Israel through the agency.

As an example of why he wants to focus on youth, Sharansky said he was asked a disturbing question when he spoke at York University a few years ago.

"The first question was, 'Why do I need Israel?'"

For Sharansky, the answer is simple.

"You're giving [students] the opportunity to belong," he said. "We're talking about their desire to be proud to belong to this path of history."

Praying for Gilad Schalit

The Ethiopian Israeli community celebrates the Sig'd holiday annually, 50 days after Yom Kippur on the 29th of Cheshvan. Kessim – spiritual leaders of the Ethiopian community – and the Israel Association for Ethiopian Jews decided to dedicate this year's Sig'd holiday on Nov. 16 to kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit. Sig'd, which was made a national holiday by the Knesset in 2008, is a day of spiritual reckoning, fasting and prayer when kessim pray for the return of missing soldiers. This year, a public prayer for Schalit's peaceful and safe return was added. [Flash90 photos]

Union 'Giant' Dies

OTTAWA — Labour activist Gil Levine died Nov. 16 in Ottawa after a brief battle with leukemia. He was 85. Levine joined the National Union of Public Employees, a predecessor of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), in the 1950s as a researcher and became the first-ever head of CUPE's research department, "which he built to legendary status. During six decades, his influence upon CUPE and the Canadian labour movement was profound and immeasurable," said Ann Dembinski, president of CUPE Local 79 in Toronto. Former CUPE president Jeff Rose called Levine "a giant of Canadian labour history."

Twinning Event Held

TORONTO — Toronto's Temple Sinai, Thornhill, Ont.'s Temple Har Zion and Shaarei-Beth El Congregation in Oakville, Ont., were among eight Toronto-area shuls and 100 mosques and synagogues throughout North America and Europe that were twinned with each other over the Nov. 14-15 weekend. The second annual event aimed to have two local congregations – a mosque and a shul – launch joint activities. The Foundation for Ethnic Understanding, which initiated the event, urged working in one of four areas: the environment, protecting immigrants, combating anti-Semitism and Islamophobia, and fighting poverty. Also taking part were the Islamic Society of North America, the Muslim Public Affairs Council, the World Jewish Congress and the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims.

World

Attack Recalled

MUMBAI — A memorial ceremony was held at the former Mumbai Chabad centre. The multifaith event was held Nov. 17 to mark the one-year anniversary of the terror attack on the city. The Nov. 26-29 attacks on several sites by an Islamist Pakistani group left 166 dead and hundreds injured. Six Jews were killed at the Chabad centre, including Rabbi Gavriel and Rivkah Holtzberg, who ran the centre. Their then-2-year-old son, Moshe, was rescued by his Indian nanny.

Retailer Funded YU

NEW YORK — Discount retail clothing chain founder Sy Syms, who supported many Jewish and non-Jewish causes, died Nov. 17 in New York from heart failure at age 83. He was a founding board member of the Sy Syms School of Business at Yeshiva University and served on YU's board of trustees. In 1987, he donated $12 million to create YU's graduate business school. He founded the Syms off-price men's clothing store in 1959.

Denier 'Unrepentant'

SYDNEY, Australia — A Holocaust denier released from an Australian jail after publishing material offensive to Jews says he's "unbroken" and "unrepentant." Fredrick Toben, 65, founder of the Adelaide Institute, emerged from three months in jail Nov. 12 after the Federal Court said he breached a 2002 court order to remove all offensive material from his institute's website. The site had a message last week saying he's "unbroken and unrepentant" and "refreshed and relaxed" after his "little holiday." The site also had a banner saying: "The days are numbered for the greatest lie in the history of mankind." Toben spent two months in prison last year as Germany tried unsuccessfully to extradite him for publishing Shoah denial material, a crime in Germany. He also spent several months in prison in Germany in 1999 for Holocaust denial.

Teachers Strike

PHILADELPHIA — Staff at a Philadelphia-area day school went on strike last week. The walkout by 49 teachers at the Jack M. Barrack Hebrew Academy in Bryn Mawr, Pa., came after their union couldn't negotiate on a new contract with the school. The pluralistic school of 310 middle- and high-school students was expected to be shut at least a week. What the school calls its "best and final" offer would cut pension contributions significantly, the union said.

Hatikvah Goes Missing At Fencing Tourney

VIENNA — Israel's national anthem wasn't played at a fencing meet in Austria after two Israeli teens won medals.

The official in charge of playing national anthems at the European Cup fencing competition in Modling, Austria, said he was unable to find a recording of Israel's national song, Hatikvah, according to UPI.

Dana Stralinkov, 14, and Alona Komarov, 13, won gold and bronze medals, respectively.

During the medal ceremony, the teens waited to hear the Israeli anthem before singing the song themselves a cappella after a few minutes of silence.

"It was a very moving moment," said their coach, Yaakov Friedman, noting that a similar incident took place five months ago at a competition in Sweden.

The tourney featured 120 fencers from 20 countries.

Tories, Liberals spar over Israel

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Prime Minister Stephen Harper's parliamentary secretary defended a flyer favourably comparing the Conservatives' record on Israel and anti-Semitism to that of the Liberals as "fact" in a heated exchange in the House of Commons Nov. 19.

Pierre Poilievre was responding to a question of privilege from Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, who charged that the claims made in the flyer are "false, misleading, prejudicial and slanderous."

Cotler demanded that the government stop sending out the flyers and apologize. His Mount Royal riding was one of several across the country whose residents received the flyers in their door last week. The mailings were apparently targeting areas with a significant Jewish population that are held by the Liberals.

Poilievre reiterated some of the points made in the flyer, starting with the assertion that the Liberal government "willingly" continued to participate in the 2001 United Nations Durban conference against racism, even after it had become a forum for anti-Semitism. He contrasted that with Harper having been the first national leader in the world to withdraw from the second Durban conference this year. He also repeated that the Harper government was the first in the world to cut fundingto the Hamas-led government in Gaza when the Liberals were calling for an increase in funding.

Poilievre said Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff stated twice in 2006 – in August and in October – that he believed Israel had committed war crimes in its conflict with Hezbollah in Lebanon.

"He may have changed his mind later on, but the reality is when the pressure was on, that is what he said."

Poilievre also recalled that in the early 2000s, it was Conservative MP Stockwell Day, now the international trade minister, who was the leading advocate for the inclusion of Hamas and Hezbollah on Canada's terrorist list, while the then-Liberal government said these organizations were running social programs and "only backed down under pressure from Day."

Poilievre, citing a series of newspaper reports, also noted that the then-Liberal MP for Toronto's Etobicoke Centre riding was on record as saying afterward that he favoured delisting Hezbollah, and that a Liberal MP had marched in a "pro-Hezbollah" rally in Montreal in August 2006. He went on that the Liberals' current public security critic is on the record as saying in 2006 that the Harper government's one-sided pro-Israel stance is "dangerous" and a "reversal" of Liberal policy.

"He is absolutely right," Poilievre said.

"The MP for Ajax-Pickering said there has never before been a so strongly pro-Israel government, exceeding even George Bush…

"If [Cotler] is uncomfortable with these facts, he should speak up against his party. He is learning the discomfort of being in a party that speaks out of both sides of its mouth."

Cotler, who was a delegate to the first Durban conference, said it makes no sense to suggest that his participation means he supported the anti-Semitic opinions expressed there. The Liberal government condemned the conference, and he has repeatedly spoken out against it, he said.

"The government of Israel publicly commended Canada for its participation at Durban and its condemnation of anti-Semitism. Does this mean the government of Israel is also identified with anti-Semitism? That's as absurd as it is false," Cotler said.

He also underlined that it was a Liberal government that pronounced Hamas and Hezbollah terrorist organizations in 2002. "For the Conservatives to take credit for that is massive political identity theft," he said.

At this juncture, Toronto-area Conservative MP Peter Kent, minister of state for foreign affairs, heckled that Cotler was "splitting hairs."

THE WAR IS OVER, BUT IZZY'S BATTLE CONTINUES...

"They look after you at Beit Halochem, and they ask for nothing in return."

In January 2009, Izzy Ezagui and 7 soldiers in his unit of the Israel Defense Forces were anxiously waiting in a tent by the Gaza border during Operation Cast Lead. Just before they were about to go in as reinforcements, rockets slammed into their tent. Izzy and 3 others were seriously wounded.

When the smoke cleared, Izzy saw that part of his arm was missing and that he was bleeding profusely. With all his strength, he walked to the nearest bomb shelter where the medics began treating him.

Despite losing 40% of his blood, Izzy remained awake and lucid. He underwent two major surgeries in two days. He is an exceptional young man who made Aliyah at 19, entered the army, was gravely wounded, and now at age 21, wants to go back and serve Israel again as a combat officer. "I believe in the nation of Israel and our history. I feel honoured to be able to participate in protecting Israel."

While recuperating, Izzy and other wounded soldiers were taken to our Tel Aviv Beit Halochem Centre, where they met with several disabled members. The specialized therapies, sports and cultural programs along with state-of-the-art equipment and facilities impressed Izzy. It comforted him to know that there was a "home" he could go to daily, a place that would help him rehabilitate and take care of his needs for the rest of his life.

With you as our partners, we will be able to turn around the lives of the many heroic people like Izzy who have given so much for the Jewish people.

PLEASE ASSIST the more than 51,000 disabled war veterans and victims of terror, who turn to Beit Halochem to help them in their REHABILITATION.

Galling complaints about Gilo

Last week in this space, I pointed out that the leader of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, has never risen to the large, dramatic, history-setting diplomatic occasion.

He has always preferred to pout and to declare himself and his people victims of Israeli malfeasance rather than take the bold step that has the force of changing currents in history's forward stream.

From the editor's desk...

This past week we saw one of the reasons why this is so: American Middle East policy under President Barack Obama actually encourages Abbas to rise no higher than the reeds and bulrushes of bilateral diplomacy.

The Municipality of Jerusalem announced the approval of plans that had long been on the drawing board for some 900 new housing units in Gilo, in the southern part of Jerusalem.

In response to the announcement, the White House said, "We are dismayed."

Administration spokesperson Robert Gibbs expressed the United States' displeasure with "the Jerusalem Planning Committee's decision to move forward on the approval process for the expansion of Gilo in Jerusalem."

After the Americans made their pronouncement on the Gilo decision, senior Palestinian official Saeb Erekat – not wishing to miss the parade, so to speak, also spoke. According to Ha'aretz, he said there was no point in negotiating while Israel expands Jewish neighbourhoods in the part of Jerusalem the Palestinians want for their capital. He said the Israeli move shows that it is meaningless to resume negotiations.

Erekat's prevarications are irritating but familiar and tiresome. The U.S. administration's heavy-handed admonitions, however, are deeply troubling.

Gilo is not in east Jerusalem. It is not in the Old City. It is a neighbourhood within the municipal boundaries of Jerusalem, mostly within pre-1967 Israel on the southern slopes of the city. The part of Gilo beyond the pre-'67 border was bought by Jews in 1948.

Some 40,000 people live in Gilo.

As Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu noted: "Construction in Gilo has taken place regularly for dozens of years, and there is nothing new about the current planning and constructions."

During the early days of the terror war unleashed by then-Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat on Israel in 2000, the homes and residents of Gilo were the targets of sniper attacks on almost a daily basis.

Only the handful of hard-core ideologues of the far left consider Gilo outside the boundary of Israel's capital.

Thus, it was entirely correct that Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat, who was in Toronto and Montreal last week, registered strong objection to the American government's attempt to prevent building by Jews in Jerusalem.

"The demand to halt construction by religion is not legal in the United States or in any other free place in the world," Barkat said. "I do not presume that any government would demand to freeze construction in the United States based on race, religion or gender, and the attempt to demand it from Jerusalem is a double standard and inconceivable. The Jerusalem Municipality will continue to allow construction in all parts of the city for Jews, Muslims and Christians, based on the same law."

Hard-hitting, incisive Israeli analyst Barry Rubin noted both the inconsistency and the dysfunctionality of the Americans' pronouncements.

"Obama said that the Gilo construction complicates administration efforts to relaunch peace talks, makes it harder to achieve peace and embitters the Palestinians.

"Funny, he never said this about: PA incitement to terrorism; failure to punish terrorists; negotiations with Hamas despite its hardline positions, genocidal goals, anti-Semitic views and terrorist acts; refusal to return to talks with Israel despite Obama's express request to do so; breaking its promise on not to be a sponsor of using the Goldstone report to punish Israel; and other such actions.

"The administration has now escalated [its demands of Israel] even higher: no construction in Jerusalem is the minimum demand. Of course, Arab states and the PA [Palestinian Authority] will echo this, refusing all talks unless that happens. And since Israel won't stop building in Jerusalem... Obama has just guaranteed a dead peace process for his entire four-year term in office. In fact, he's probably ensured no comprehensive negotiations will take place, much less succeed."

It is puzzling that Obama should have reacted so swiftly to the Palestinian leaders' characterization of the Gilo decision. It was a non-thinking, automatic, reflexive response to Abbas' whining.

It must be emphasized that the reason "Israel won't stop building in Jerusalem" is because building in Jerusalem touches the very heart of the Zionist dream expressed in Hatikvah: "to be a free people in the Land of Zion and Jerusalem."

Separating the Jews from Jerusalem is the Palestinians' aim. But it should not also be the Americans' purpose.

DENTIST VOLUNTEERS AND RAISES FUNDS FOR JERUSALEM CLINIC

Toronto dentist Richard Nurgitz volunteered recently at DVI (Dental Volunteers for Israel) in Jerusalem for the sixth time. The clinic provides free dental care to needy children from a variety of backgrounds between the ages of five to 18. From left, at the memorial to DVI founder Trudi Birger, are clinic director Roy Petel; Nurgitz; immediate past director Moti Moskovitz and two volunteer dentists from France. Nurgitz, a cycling enthusiast, and his wife, Naomi, also toured Israel on their road bikes with another couple to raise money for the clinic.

Federation must focus on youth, new chair says

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

On his last night as chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's board of directors, David Koschitzky welcomed his successor with an old saying.

"The king is dead, the king is dead, long live the king," he said before introducing Alan Winer as the new chair at last week's annual meeting.

While addressing a group of about 90 people, Winer laid out his goals for his two-year term, which include better absorption of Jewish immigrants into the community and strengthening Jewish identity in the younger generation.

"We have a tremendous Jewish community in Toronto. It is... growing, successful, diverse and complex," he said. "Yet our Jewish community is faced with many challenges."

One of these centres on youth, he said.

"Approximately half of the Jewish school-age children in Toronto receive some kind of formal Jewish education... However, unless we concentrate on the other 50 per cent... we run the risk of allowing an entire generation to lose its way."

Winer, a former vice-chair of federation's board of directors, went on to say that the organized Jewish community needs to be more inclusive.

"We need to open more doors to community participation for individuals who don't neatly fit into our definition or perception of the Jewish community, including those with physical and mental disabilities," he said.

During the meeting, board members discussed the economic downturn, which was reflected in the federation's financial figures.

Last year, UJA Federation lost more than $18 million on its investments, although around $12 million has been recouped in the first quarter of the new year, the meeting heard.

In 2008-09, about $82 million was raised through the annual UJA campaign, the Tomorrow Campaign and the Jewish Foundation.

Federation president and CEO Ted Sokolsky emphasized the importance of philanthropy.

"That's the way a community comes together," he said. "Despite the economic downturn, through hard work and effort, we were able to provide our schools and agencies with the same amount of money... in some cases more."

In 2008-09, federation spent $13 million on formal Jewish education.

To Koschitzky, investing in youth is vital.

"Everything we have done and everything we do is dedicated to ensuring the next generation understands and values its Jewish heritage," he said.

"On the surface, our kids are no different than any other children in Toronto, but if properly nurtured with our traditions and culture, they grow up to represent, respect and be proud of our unique heritage."

Longstanding, historic Canadian connection

Sixty-two years ago, on Nov. 29, 1947, at a meeting in Lake Success, N.Y., after lengthy heated debate, the United Nations General Assembly approved the partition of British Mandatory Palestine into an Arab and a Jewish state along with the internationalization of the holy city of Jerusalem. The vote on the historic Resolution 181 was 33 votes in favour, 13 against, 10 abstentions and one absent.

Even in the face of unambiguously loud opposition by Great Britain, Canada supported partition. Australia for example, abstained.

Canada's role in the adoption of the partition plan, however, was far more significant than in the registration of an affirmative vote at that tumultuous assembly meeting 62 years ago. But for Canada, it is doubtful there would have been a partition plan submitted to the General Assembly for its consideration in the first place.

Canadian Supreme Court Justice Ivan Rand was the moral fulcrum on which the deliberations of the 11 member-states of the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP) were balanced. Ultimately, he was instrumental in persuading his UNSCOP colleagues to adopt and submit the majority report recommending partition. (Please see the related story on page 24.)

In the recent biography of Rand titled Canadian Maverick: The Life and Times of Ivan C. Rand, published for the Osgoode Society for Canadian Legal History by University of Toronto Press, author William Kaplan wrote of Rand's participation on UNSCOP that he "clearly played a pivotal role at an important time." Kaplan further notes that Israeli historian Uri Milstein concluded that "the one who tipped the scales was the Canadian representative, Judge Ivan Rand."

"In language clearly drafted by Rand," Kaplan writes, "the majority report observed: 'The Jews bring to the land the social dynamism and scientific method of the West; the Arabs confront them with individualism and intuitive understanding of life. Here then in this close association… can be evolved a synthesis of the two civilizations, preserving, at the same time, their fundamental characteristics. In each state, the native genus will have a scope and opportunity to evolve into its highest cultural forms and to attain its greatest reaches of mind and spirit.'"

Kaplan adds that "when consideration of the report moved to New York, [senior Canadian diplomat and future prime minister] Lester Pearson took up where Rand had left off."

It is important to remember that the history of the conflict between the Arabs and the Jews in Palestine did not begin in June 1967, when the victorious Israeli army "occupied" the West Bank and Gaza and reunited a physically divided Jerusalem. It is also important to recall that in trying, finally, to end the conflict, Canada in late 1947 did its best to bring about the most moral, most ethical, most pragmatic, most just solution. And it is still trying.

Auschwitz survivor Elie Wiesel denounced people who have "vulgarized and commercialized" the term Holocaust, citing a sportscaster who referred to his team losing a game as a sports holocaust. Wiesel argued that the term referred to "word beyond words" and should not be trivialized.

Rights act and Islamic 'hate speech'

The Canadian Jewish Congress continues to throw free expression under the rails, and for what ("CJC defends web hate section of rights act," Nov. 5)? So that its proxy can haul "Nazis" who pose absolutely no threat to us in front of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal? So that an addled First Nations leader will be forced to account for his "thought crimes"? How pathetic, and how tragically short-sighted. For while the "human rights" system and criminal courts deal with the phantom menace of homegrown Nazis, the real threat to Jews goes unchallenged: in downtown Toronto, an angry mob of Hamas supporters chants hateful epithets, and a small group of counter-protesters are told to run for their lives because police cannot protect them; at York University, police are called in to rescue some Jewish students who have been cornered by angry Israel-haters; at the University of Toronto, a student, originally from Bangladesh, posts vitriolic Judenhass on the web, and authorities refuse to charge him with a hate crime, and a Somali imam in Toronto spews hate-filled sermons with impunity.

Is there no one at the CJC who can see what's happening here – the smaller picture, which reveals Canadian authorities disinclined to do anything about Islamic "hate speech," and the bigger picture, which shows free speech under grave threat from a United Nations in thrall to its largest voting bloc, the Organization of the Islamic Conference? Now more than ever we need our free speech. Otherwise, to quote the title of Mark Steyn's latest book, it's "lights out" for freedom around the world.

Goldstone report

I am appalled by the naiveté of so many in our community who still cannot connect the dots between Jewish support of social action, human rights and emancipation movements on the one hand and Jewish self-hatred and rabid anti-Semitism, on the other. In "The Jew flu: the strange illness of Jewish anti-Semitism" in Ha'aretz, Uzi Silber writes that "Jew flu" is a condition in which being "more sensitive to pain suffered by members of a group other than [one's] own metastasizes into a malignant emotional and moral identification with people committed to [one's] annihilation." Therein lies the tragedy of the well-meaning but misguided Richard Goldstones in our community and their legions of Jewish apologists.

Crosses on Jewish soldiers' graves

In Avrum Rosensweig's Nov. 12 column, he mentions that in World War II, 500 Jewish soldiers were buried in Europe with Stars of David ("Jews, Natives and Remembrance Day"). However, not all Jewish servicemen were buried with the Magen David. My cousin, Joseph (Yosl) Spector of Winnipeg joined the air force at the age of 18 in 1941 and three years later, in May 1944, was tragically shot down. After the war, when his brother went to visit his grave in the Reichswald Forest near the Dutch/German border, he found it adorned with a cross. He notified the Canadian government, which rectified the situation. I can't help thinking that there may be other Jewish servicemen who mistakenly have crosses instead of the Magen David at their gravesites.

My great-grandfather, Mendel Elie (circa 1860-1934), and his wife and seven children, arrived in Canada in August 1907 aboard the Sardinian. They came from Podu Iloaiei, a small town in northeast Romania (Moldavia), near the city of Iasi, following the 1906 pogroms. The ship's passenger lists (at collectionscanada.gc.ca) show the following Jewish/Romanian families arriving on the same ship: Goldenberg, Herscovici, Haimovici, Kohn, Leibovici, Moscovici, Stohler (pronounced Hirshkovich, Chaimovich, Cohen, Lebovich, Moscovich, Stoller). I know from other sources that we had relatives in Podu Iloaiei with most of these surnames, so it's possible all eight families came from the same town and travelled together as a group. Are you descended from any of these families? Any information would be greatly appreciated.

Jews get tangled up in the British courts

Beleaguered British Jewry, stuck in its Victorian ways and battered daily by the BBC, the Guardian newspaper and other marin bishin – "malevolent spirits" – has faced another public fiasco: the widely-reported legal challenge to its right to define "What is a Jew?"

The new U.K. Supreme Court has yet to issue its judgment on the case, centred on a student who was refused entry to a London Jewish high school – the JFS. But what are the real issues? How did this question come before the courts at all? And what minor part did I play in the story?

By Paul Shaviv

To understand the saga, you have to explore the background.

The Jewish 'map'

As in every European country, in the U.K., the historical "default" Jewish stream is Orthodoxy. Only in North America were the Orthodox the last to arrive and the last to organize. They are still only a minority within the Jewish community. But in Britain, approximately 70 per cent of synagogue-affiliated Jews belong to Orthodox synagogues, most of them to the London-based United Synagogue organization, founded by Act of Parliament in 1880 to be a Jewish version of the Anglican Church and granting a certain legal status to the chief rabbi, as befits a Jewish Archbishop of Canterbury.

Rabbinic authority in Britain – unlike in the United States or Canada – is thus highly centralized. Crucially, most Jewish organizations, including schools, conform to Orthodox practices by constitution or custom, even though the U.K. Jewish community – including the United Synagogue membership – is largely non-observant.

There is virtually no Jewish pluralism in Britain. The firewalls between Orthodox and non-Orthodox are high, impenetrable and militantly policed, certainly on the Orthodox side. This is something of an obsession in England. A United member who does not eat kosher, does not observe Shabbat and goes to his synagogue only once a year will be passionate in opposition to "the Reform." Please do not try and make sense of this.

Most Jewish schools in the United Kingdom (no longer all) are constitutionally "under the Ecclesiastical Authority of the chief rabbi," and admission to the schools requires confirmation from the Office of the Chief Rabbi that the pupil is halachically Jewish. In practice, that means the office of the London Beth Din. A second British obsession greatly fears the admission of non-halachic Jews to Jewish schools, "because it causes intermarriage." This assumes teens choose their marriage partners in high school and never meet anyone else at college, in the workplace, in the line at the local supermarket, or even in their local synagogue.

The chief rabbi and the London Beth Din

In theory, the chief rabbi presides over the London Beth Din (rabbinical court), which employs five full-time dayanim (judges). As the website of the Beth Din delicately puts it, the chief rabbi "is generally not involved with Beth Din's day-to-day work." The dayanim are all intensively Orthodox (haredi). They regulate the religious and ritual affairs of an overwhelmingly non-observant community, including matters of marriage, divorce and conversion to Judaism. The London Beth Din operates in the aura of the late dayan Yechezkel Abramsky z"l (1886-1976). Abramsky – regarded as one of the 20th century's pre-eminent Talmudists – headed the London Beth Din from 1934 to 1951. He established its reputation and its policies, which included promoting a halachic "gold standard" for conversion to Judaism. Obtaining an Orthodox conversion to Judaism via the London Beth Din is an extremely tough, long procedure, and is effectively designed to ensure that only individuals willing to embrace a haredi lifestyle will complete the process.

The school

The JFS (formerly called the Jews' Free School) is Europe's largest Jewish school. Now located in Jewish suburbia, it was founded in the East End of London in 1732. The school is a part of the London public school system. JFS is a seven-year high school (ages 11 to 18) on the British model, with 2,000 students. Its intake is overwhelmingly non-observant, and although it has a truly outstanding academic record – it is widely regarded as London's best public school – the time given to Jewish studies and Hebrew is way below the standards in other communities. This is what makes the court case even more absurd.

The legislation

Britain's 1976 Race Relations Act outlaws discrimination in all areas of life, applying to public and private institutions alike. Among the forbidden categories of discrimination is any distinction or discrimination based on ethnic origin or parentage. At the time the legislation was drafted, this writer was a young man working (in an educational capacity) for the grandly named Board of Deputies of British Jews, a sort of British Canadian Jewish Congress.

At the time, the president of the board was Lord Samuel "Sammy" Fisher, a canny, somewhat conspiratorial, character. Sammy Fisher was an East End Jew who had been very active in municipal government on behalf of the Labour party. He was very close to then-prime minister Harold Wilson, who created him Lord Fisher of Camden. He fought hard to get the Jewish community included in the compass of the 1976 act. I did point out to him that the act made no exemption for the Jewish or any other religion where status was passed down from parent to child, and that there was a potential conflict. "Young man," he told me with a pitying look, "no British court would ever rule against the Jewish religion."

Jewish Free School on Middlesex Street 1908.

Well, one just did!

The case

Here is where all of the above comes together. In most communities, students are welcomed into Jewish schools. Their Jewish status is regarded as a matter for their family and their local synagogue. It is not the school's business. Not so in England.

Over a period of years, the London Beth Din has refused to recognize the Jewish status of a number of aspiring JFS students, enraging Jewish public opinion. This included refusal to recognize as valid some Orthodox conversion ceremonies carried out in Israel by the Israeli chief rabbinate, finding fault retroactively with the converts' sincerity. This was a standard much more stringent than that of the general, mainstream United Synagogue community. It was pointed out that several Jewish schools in declining communities (Birmingham, Liverpool and Glasgow) actually had majorities of Christian and Muslim students. That was fine, but Israeli rabbinate conversions apparently weren't.

One result of this was the founding of a new Community High School, on the North American model, due to open in September 2010. But another result was the formation of a group of angry parents. (One student refused admission was the son of the head of English at the school.) Finally, the Jewish-from-birth father of a boy whose mother was converted to Judaism under non-Orthodox auspices (a different case from some of the others) took the school to court because of its refusal to admit his son to the school. He was supported by other "JFS refuseniks."

The only law under which the case could be judged was the 1976 act, which of course said that any distinction based on parentage was illegal. Initially, the families lost. Then they took the case to appeal. The Jewish Appeal court judge ruled that under the terms of the act, any entry requirement that involved parental status was discriminatory under the letter of the English law. Period. Religious schools involved religion – belief and practice, not parentage. The school and the United Synagogue (spending hundreds of thousands of dollars in legal fees) then took the case to Britain's new Supreme Court, whose verdict is now awaited.

The fallout

What this has done is to immensely complicate the legal status of Jewishness in English law for all sorts of purposes, many of which will no doubt unfold in the coming decades. For this reason, almost all British Jewish Orthodox and non-Orthodox leaders supported what was really the JFS-United Synagogue's attempt to keep any discussion of Jewish status out of the legal system.

Only an amendment to the 1976 act will repair the problem. I cannot do better than my daughter, writing from England about the case in the Forward.

"The Supreme Court's ruling on this issue is due in a matter of weeks. As we all wait, Lord Sacks [the chief rabbi] and the rest of Britain's Orthodox establishment should be asking themselves some tough questions. Namely, how did they contribute to the communal climate of outrage that helped bring us to this juncture? And was it was really worth sacrificing our educational institutions' independence and provoking a secular court to impose its own definition of Jewish identity just to keep two 11-year-olds – who are almost certainly halachically Jewish – out of their school?"

It recently became known that "a student whose mother underwent a [non-Orthodox] conversion ceremony" has now been admitted to the school.

To be a blessing

Recently, I spoke at the launch of a chap book titled Blessings, to which I contributed an article. Strangely, the occasion brought on intense reflections that didn't engage me when I wrote my original essay. Coupled with discussions in a course on the history of Jewish food, I pondered the connection between our place in this universe and our sense of purpose and sanctity. Why bless anything? What is it we do when we bless something?

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

I know we show gratitude. That's surely important and worthwhile. But we do much more when we bless an item or event. We confer meaning and mark the item as special.

In uttering a blessing, we take time to differentiate it from the mundane. If we bless it, we're saying that it's special. We're also distinguishing ourselves from the animal world. We're saying that eating isn't merely biological, and we're not merely physical. My humanity comes from a distinctive context, filled with sanctity. I'm special because of how I was created, because of my place in this world. I seek meaning and purpose.

There's something sacred here in my connection to the item and moment. And I feel obligated to comment, hence the blessing. I also want to endure, so the blessing marks the moment, appreciates it and appeals for continued beneficence.

But what brings the element of the sacred to bear? How does it enter?

In Judaism, there are two applicable perspectives. In one, the item being blessed is commonplace, part of the temporal world that surrounds us. Regular and everyday, its familiarity needs no introduction. By making a blessing, we bring it into a sacred realm. Then the item or the act can have meaning and a lasting affect on our lives. We bring it to sanctity through the blessing.

The second perspective contests this view of the mundane world. It sees the world as inherently sacred, filled with significance and distinctiveness. In this scenario, a blessing is made not to confer but to recognize the item's sanctity. The world as created is already sacred. One blesses something as a way of saying, "May I partake of this item, since it is so sacred?"

These two positions reflect very different attitudes toward the world, its creation and the Creator. All must bless in gratitude, but the very nature of the world and our place in it shifts. From each view, blessings posit design and value but differing human vistas.

Enjoy the view and the blessing that your life should be a blessing.

Man plans, God laughs

"Receive with simplicity everything that happens to you." (Rashi?)

This quote flashes on the screen at the beginning of the most recent Coen brothers' movie, A Serious Man.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Is this a true quote? Who knows? Like the rest of the film, which leaves you wondering just how far one can take the admonition to "receive with simplicity," it could be part of the movie's mind-bending cinematic structure.

Haven't seen the film? You're missing, if not a treat, a chance to experience a modern-day version of the story of Job. Some claim that the film is an update of an Isaac Bashevis Singer story, but I couldn't find one that so perfectly mirrored the film as does the book of Job.

Opening scene: a shtetl in Europe, with a radically different Tevye coming home to the hovel with a story of a rescue by a chap from the next village. Turns out, Tevye's wife says, that the rescuer has been dead for years. It seems the husband has invited a dybbuk to share supper. Yiddish alert: the first 10 minutes are in resonant Yiddish, with subtitles for those of us who are Yiddishly impaired.

What happens next sets the stage for the life of a descendant of that watchful woman. Is it retribution?

Gopnik – a physics professor, father of two teenagers and husband of a wife who decides to leave him for a passive-aggressive and very unpleasant neighbour – suddenly finds his life turning to dreck as his wife deserts him, his brother becomes a felon, and his professional career looks like it will disintegrate.

Like Job, he seeks the advice of three comforters – in this case, three rabbis – whose "advice" is about as useful as Job's friends' words were.

Finally he blurts out desperately: "Why me? I try to live a good life. My kids go to Hebrew school. My son will be bar mitzvah in a week. I have tried to be a good member of the community. Why me?"

"Shall not the Judge of all the earth do justly?" asked Abraham when confronted with the destruction of Sodom.

That question has bedeviled humankind since the dawn of human self-awareness. "If God is God, he is not good," says J.B. in the play by Archibald MacLeish, another take on the Job predicament.

Can evil and tragedy be the work of the Judge of all the earth? Unthinkable. Is the creator of all the source of evil? Impossible. For Job/Gopnik, the question is "Why do bad things happen to ordinary people, people going about their ordinary lives in ordinary places? I've tried to be a serious man!"

Elie Wiesel writes about the resonance of the book of Job for survivors of the Holocaust. Millions of Jews – believers, agnostics, atheists, Chassidim, Communists who perished as one, regardless of their faithfulness or apostasy – why did they die? Moreover, why did some live? Where was the Judge of all the earth?

Despite books such as When Bad Things Happen to Good People, the answer still eludes us. Not only was Job leading a blameless life (Gopnik has a few misdemeanours against him), he constantly refused to either admit he was a sinner or curse God. "Though he slay me yet will I trust him." "I know that my Redeemer lives." What faith!

Ironically, neither Job nor the hapless Gopnik ever finds out why they're so afflicted. God squashes Job's protests with a shower of power, but never enlightens him about the wager made with his accuser, Satan. Gopnik has no idea of what transpired in the ghetto, and we don't know if there was any relationship between that scene and the Gopnik saga. Did one sin transmit its punishment to the second and third generations? We don't know.

The best we can say, for Job as for Gopnik, is that we cannot know. How could we? As Avivah Zornberg writes in The Murmuring Deep: "The human being is limited, mortal and contingent, while God is infinite, eternal and absolute."

Add unknowable, inscrutable, and you have A Serious Man.

We must follow Jewish issues in the media

Canadian Jewish Congress provides a daily e-mail service that highlights the media coverage of news stories of interest to the Canadian Jewish community. The CJN also provides detailed coverage of many of these news items, as well as other matters of interest to the community. There is also a multitude of stories of relevance to Canadian Jewry in print and broadcast media, as well as on various reliable Internet sources.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

On reviewing current issues making the news, one can see a pattern or trend of essentially five types of reports.

First, there are the disturbing, repetitive and seemingly endless examples of anti-Semitism. More particularly, we recently read of the upcoming appeal of a fine imposed upon Holocaust-denying British Bishop Richard Williamson. He was fined 12,000 Euros in Germany for denying the Holocaust in an interview with Swedish television. Recently, here in Canada, in a single television newscast, there was reference to a number of incidents of anti-Jewish graffiti defacing Jewish institutions, in Ottawa, Barrie and Calgary.

Secondly, there are the unnecessary and bothersome reports of disunity and dissension within our own community. Recently, we learned of the case presently before the British courts dealing with the question of "Who is a Jew?" It relates to the admission of a 12-year-old observant Jew into a publically funded private school. The chief rabbi ruled that the child was non-Jewish because his mother had converted to Judaism in a non-Orthodox conversion. The parents sued alleging discrimination. The school was ordered by the Court of Appeal to admit the child, and the matter will be heard further by the new British Supreme Court. In a similar vein, there was a report recently from Jerusalem about haredi protests against businesses operating on Shabbat.

Thirdly, there are uplifting reports of often courageous and valiant contributions by individuals who work to achieve a better world for members of our community and for society at large. These include the honouring of Polish Holocaust heroes in Montreal, the Remembrance Day recognition of Jewish war veterans and Jewish soldiers who lost their lives, and the honouring of MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler for his untiring work for human rights. We celebrate those within our midst for their outstanding achievement for the betterment of all.

There are many current stories related to the State of Israel and its frustrated aspirations to thrive in a safe and secure environment in a peaceful Middle East. These include the danger to Israel from a nuclear Iran with its Holocaust-denying, anti-Israel leadership; the uncertainty of potential leadership changes within the Palestinian authority; Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's policy with respect to Jewish settlements in the West Bank and the Palestinian intention to unilaterally ask the United Nations for recognition of an independent Palestinian state with east Jerusalem as its capital.

In addition to these major categories of news stories, all of which particularly relate to members of Jewish communities, there's another category of news coverage that speaks to the overarching concern of Jews in the promotion and protection of human rights throughout the world. We as a community possess a particular sensitivity to the systematic human rights abuses, even to the point of genocidal conduct, in distant, remote areas of the world. For example, there have been several news stories concerning the bringing to justice of perpetrators of past human rights abuses and genocide in Rwanda and the efforts to achieve an immediate cessation of current abuses in Darfur.

An obvious consequence of this media coverage is that it can be overwhelming. Yet, we have an obligation to keep abreast of the many issues facing the Jewish community. As a starting point, we must pay attention to the omnipresent coverage of Jewish concerns in the media. Although, realistically, we must be somewhat selective in facing current challenges, as informed Jews, we have a responsibility, both collectively and individually, to contribute to our community and to better our world.

The Kirshner File

A Polish Righteous Among the Nations

Marian Golebiowski, 90, slipped his hand into his leather briefcase and retrieved three treasured photographs.

The first one, which was in black and white and somewhat hazy, looked dated. It was of a woman, a makeshift placard around her neck, being led away by armed men.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The two other photographs, which were in colour and in much sharper focus, showed three relaxed men standing on a wooded hillside.

Golebiowski, his voice rising and falling in excitement, explained the meaning of the pictures.

The woman in the first photograph was a Polish Catholic, like himself, who had broken a draconian law in Nazi-occupied Poland through an act of compassion.

By giving a thirsty Jewish man water, she condemned herself. According to a 1941 decree, any Pole caught assisting a Jew was summarily executed.

"She was shot in cold blood," said Golebiowski, adding that the menacing words on the placard were meant to discourage Poles from helping Jews.

The additional pictures, taken in western Jerusalem, showed three men: Golebiowski, Bernard Hellreich, an Australian physician, and Uri Huppert, an Israeli lawyer and writer.

In 1942, when he was a resident of the town of Nowy Sacz and worked there as a labourer in a coal mine, Golebiowski met two Jews, Teresa Huppert and her son, Uri, who were hiding in a villa in Rytro, a neighbouring town, under an assumed name and masquerading as Christians.

Golebiowski supplied them with food and moral support and thus saved their lives.

He also helped another Polish Jew, Bernard Hellreich, a physician whose life was under constant threat.

He hid Hellreich and his Catholic wife, Irena, in his house and then, after sensing danger, moved them to another hiding place.

Golebiowski thereby rescued four people who, if caught by the Germans, would have been murdered or shipped to a Nazi concentration camp in Poland.

Decades later, Golebiowski was officially thanked for his courageous acts of kindness by Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial and museum.

On Nov. 27, 1989, Yad Vashem conferred upon him the title of Righteous Among the Nations.

A month later, in a poignant ceremony in Jerusalem, he planted an olive tree on the Hill of Remembrance, while the Warsaw National Philharmonic serenaded him with Gaude Mater Polonia, a medieval Polish hymn.

Last year, Golebiowski was awarded the Order of Poland Reborn by Poland's president, Lech Kaczynski.

Recently, Golebiowski was in Toronto as a guest of the Polish government. Along with two other Righteous Poles who had flown in for the occasion, Marianna Jarosz Krasnodebska and Janina Gutowska Rozecka, he was feted at the Polish consulate.

Poland's ambassador to Canada, Piotr Ogrodzinski, hailed the honorees, saying they had built "strong bridges" between Poles and Jews. The consul general, Marek Ciesielczuk, also paid tribute, while Poland's secretary of state at the chancellery of the president, Ewa Junczyk-Ziomecka, described them as "extraordinary people" whose stories are full of "pain and tragedy."

Apart from Toronto, the first stop on their Canadian trip, the Righteous Poles visited Montreal and Ottawa, where they were greeted by Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Since 1963, Yad Vashem has designated 22,765 men and women as Righteous Among the Nations. Poland tops the list, with more than 6,000 names. Of these, 704 Poles were honoured posthumously.

To qualify for the award, a person must have extended aid without any financial gain expected in return, except for direct expenses incurred in assisting Jews. By all accounts, hundreds of thousands of Poles risked their lives to help Jews, although some Poles, branded in Polish as szmalcownik, betrayed Jews, while still other Poles, as in the town of Jedwabne, massacred Jews. According to historians, the majority of Poles were simply indifferent.

The exact number of Jews who owed their lives to Poles has not been ascertained, but about 100,000 out of 3.3 million Jews in pre-war Poland may have been the beneficiaries of such assistance and survived the Holocaust.

Zegota, the Council to Aid Jews, was the pre-eminent Polish organization to come to their rescue. In 1943, in Warsaw alone, Zegota cared for some 2,500 Jewish children.

The late Irena Sendler, the head of Zegota's children's department and an employee of Warsaw's social welfare department, is regarded as one of the most effective Righteous Poles. They paid a heavy price for their altruism. It is estimated that thousands were executed for rendering assistance to Jews.

Marian Golebiowski

Compared to Sendler, a heroine of magnificent proportions, Golebiowski is a relatively minor figure in the rescue of Polish Jews. But in absolute terms, he is a hero, too.

He was born on Aug. 15, 1919, in Tarnapol, then in eastern Poland but now in Ukraine and known as Ternopil. A major city in eastern Galicia, Tarnapol was founded as a Polish military stronghold in the mid-16th century.

Repeatedly plundered and sacked by waves of Tatar and Russian invaders, it came under Austrian rule after Poland's first of three partitions in 1772.

During Word War I, Tarnapol passed into Russian hands, and in the wake of the dissolution of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, it was one of the main cities in the short-lived Ukrainian People's Republic.

Captured by Poland in the subsequent Polish-Russian War, Tarnapol was successively conquered and occupied by the Soviet Union and Germany in World War II.

Reoccupied by the Russians in 1944, Tarnapol was annexed by the Soviet Union.

Since Ukraine's independence in 1991, Tarnapol, 132 kilometres east of Lviv (Lvov), has been in Ukrainian territory.

In 1939, 40 per cent of Tarnapol's population was Jewish, while 50 per cent was Polish and 10 per cent was Ukrainian.

When the war erupted, Golebiowski was already a soldier in the Polish army and participated in the defence of Lvov.

He was brought up in a spirit of tolerance, his father Jozef having been a lawyer who shared a practice with a Jewish friend, Henryk Sereth. During the war, Golebiowski's hopes of becoming a concert pianist were dashed when he injured his hands in hard physical labour. In a further blow, his father was deported by the Soviets, never to return.

He has no idea what happened to his father's business partner, but in all probability, he was murdered by the Nazis in pogroms, like nearly every Jew in Tarnapol, whose ghetto was liquidated in June 1943.

He does not clothe himself in a heroic halo. "I'm a man who likes people," said Golebiowski, a feisty, talkative person. "My family always had friendly relations with Jews."

After the war, the Hupperts immigrated to Israel, while Hellreich and his wife settled in Australia, changing their surname to Ingram.

As for Golebiowski, he became a lawyer in postwar Poland, working independently and for the Warsaw National Philharmonic as deputy director.

He is ashamed of the 1968 state-orchestrated anti-Semitic campaign, which prompted upwards of 30,000 highly assimilated Jews to leave Poland. And he bristles at the mention of Holocaust deniers. "They are terrible," he said, using an extremely nasty Polish phrase to describe them.

He is hopeful about the future of Polish-Jewish relations, which have historically been mercurial. "There are still, of course, anti-Semites in Poland," he said, "but there has been a 180 degree shift in attitudes toward Jews, and a lot of good things are happening in Poland today."

Challenges can be overcome, teacher believes

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When Carole Traister returned to school at age 40 to get her B.Ed., she was determined to make a difference in the public school system, where one of her sons had negative experiences related to his learning disability and attention deficit hyperactivity disorder.

But Traister's first job offer after graduating from the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) came from United Synagogue Day School, and she accepted it with the intention of staying for a year.

A lesson from the teacher: "Success comes in 'cans,' not 'can'ts.' If you say you can, you will. If you say you can't, you won't."

Eleven years later, she is still at USDS' south branch, at Beth Tzedec Congregation, where she teaches Grade 2 general studies in the morning and Grade 3 in the afternoon.

"I fell in love with the philosophy, the children, the parents, the administration and my colleagues," Traister said in a recent interview. "It was a force greater than me… I was meant to come here. I truly believe it."

Her warmth and ease with her students is evident as soon as she enters the school office trailing three of them who wanted to see her "guest" from The CJN before the interview.

Traister, who had already received an M.Ed. in child assessment and counselling from U of T's Institute of Child Study in 1981, used to teach junior and senior kindergarten at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. She also has a BA in psychology from York University and early childhood education credentials from George Brown College.

She credits her son's Grade 6 teacher for focusing on his positive achievements, an unexpected experience for him at the time.

Now Traister tries to do the same with her own students.

"If I know that I have a child who perhaps needs that extra encouragement on the first day, I'll make sure I say that I see that child sitting nicely on the carpet… or sitting at [his or her] desk prepared to learn. It just builds a positive relationship from that very first moment, and it's so crucial to teaching."

She stresses to students that they have to be prepared to make mistakes in order to learn.

"My job is to teach them in a way that they can learn. Every child is capable of learning. It's just a matter of finding the way that they learn best," Traister said.

On the first day of school, she has students write her a letter outlining what they think she needs to know about them as learners and what they'd like to get out of the year in her class.

In June, she returns the letter to them. "We look to see if their goals were met," she said.

Also, "they love seeing how they wrote in September… They all have growth in their writing."

She recalls a student a few years ago who wrote that she was a "bad" math student. Traister's response was that there's no such thing. "You have to believe that you can be a good math student," she recalls saying.

Recently, the same student told her that she had just gotten a high mark in math and that Traister had been right.

"Kids need to know that everyone has challenges, and it's how we handle them that make a difference," she said. "Challenges can be overcome or compensated for."

Traister also believes it's important for students to see teachers taking a leadership role in the school. A student council adviser who is involved in annual school fundraising projects – as well as in fundraising outside of school for JWI – she said, "We see our kids as future leaders."

Palestinian doctor delivers message of peace

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A Palestinian who might have been angry, bitter and vengeful over a profoundly personal tragedy delivered a poignant message of forgiveness, love and brotherhood last week.

Nearly a year after two Israeli tank shells slammed into one of his bedrooms and killed three of his children in a senseless incident that deeply embarrassed Israel, Dr. Izzeldin Abuelaish, a 54-year-old Palestinian physician from the Gaza Strip, stood in a Toronto synagogue preaching the virtues of reconciliation, dialogue and non-violence.

"We choose the path of light rather than to live with hatred and be consumed by revenge," he declared in an affecting speech Nov. 17 at Beth Tzedec Congregation. "Violence is not the solution."

Currently an associate professor of medicine at the Dalla Lana School of Public Health at the University of Toronto's faculty of medicine, he was the guest of honour at an unusual interfaith gathering sponsored by a coalition of Canadian organizations.

Abuelaish, the son of Palestinian Muslim refugees displaced from their homes, was praised by a procession of admirers before delivering his talk.

Norman Kahn, president of Beth Tzedec, described him an an "extraordinary" person. Israel's consul general in Toronto, Amir Gissin, called him "a hero of our two nations" who has displayed "incredible strength and determination."

Mark Persaud, president of the Canadian International Peace Project, hailed him as a "remarkable" individual, while Dr. Arnold Noyek, founder of the Canada International Scientific Exchange Centre for International Health, said he was an "inspirational" figure who has brought together Israelis and Palestinians.

Abuelaish, who has practised medicine in Be'er Sheva and Tel Aviv, was at his home in the Jebaliya refugee camp when his life changed in an acrid flash.

Last winter, after its shaky ceasefire with Hamas broke down and the Islamic fundamentalist group continued firing rockets at Israeli communities across the border, Israel invaded Gaza.

As Israel's forces drove deeper into Gaza during the three-week war, a pair of Israeli tanks hit a three-storey residential building where Abuelaish and his family resided.

To this day, the strike has yet to be fully explained, but the upshot of it was that three of his six daughters – Bisan, 20, Mayar, 15 and Aya, 13 – were killed.

The shells also struck down their cousin, Nour, 14, and injured another one of Abuelaish's daughters, Shatha, who was 16 at the time. On that dark day, barely four months had elapsed since he had lost his wife, Nadia, to the ravages of cancer.

In the wake of the incident, he phoned an Israeli friend, a journalist, and an ambulance was sent to transport the injured girls to a hospital in Israel.

"It is hard to describe that dreadful scene," Abuelaish said as he launched into his simple and moving speech. "I wouldn't want anyone to see what I saw," he added in a reference to his daughters' splattered body parts.

Astonishingly enough, Abuelaish, who has said he raised his daughters to be "soldiers of peace," was not embittered by their deaths.

"Life must continue and we must keep moving," mused Abuelaish, who arrived in Toronto last July and is here on a five-year contract. Speaking as a doctor, he observed, "We must focus on prevention, not treatment."

Accentuating the positive, he said he was blessed by the fact that the shells spared his other daughters, one of whom accompanied him to Beth Tzedec. Somehow rising above his anger, he said that justice, trust and peace can lead Israelis and Palestinians to a better future. Although he was short on specifics, he suggested that a two-state solution is the answer.

After he finished, Jacqueline Swartz of Canadian Friends of Peace Now and Donna Holbrook of the Christian Embassy in Jerusalem heaped praise on him.

Shahid Akhtar, co-chair of the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims, issued a challenge. "We can't allow his sentiments to melt into thin air," he said, urging dialogue between Jews and Muslims. At this point, members of the audience, seated around numbered tables laden with Middle Eastern sweets, were asked to reflect on Abuelaish's comments and contribute questions for his consideration.

Asked how he is perceived in Gaza, he claimed that his fellow Gazans are proud of his efforts to break down Arab-Israeli barriers.

After being asked what he has taught his daughters about Jews, he coaxed one of them to the podium, a painfully shy 10-year-old girl named Raffah whose head did not even reach the microphone, and in halting Hebrew she said, "I love you."

The event was sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee, the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, the Canadian International Peace Project, the Canada International Scientific Exchange Program, Hillel of Greater Toronto, Holy Blossom Temple, Canadian Jewish Congress, the International Christian Embassy Jerusalem, Rebuilding Shattered Lives, Kids 4 Peace, Peace Now, the New Israel Fund of Canada, Neighbourhood Interfaith Group, Save A Child's Heart and the Danforth Jewish Circle.

U of T profs debate Palestinian statehood

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The topic of the debate was simple yet maddeningly complex: is a resolution of Israel's protracted and bloody dispute with the Palestinians a real possibility or merely an illusion?

Two University of Toronto professors debated the contentious issue politely last week at a Holy Blossom Temple forum presented by the Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman Centre for Jewish Learning.

The debaters were Derek Penslar, a liberal and an optimist, and Clifford Orwin, a conservative and a pessimist.

Penslar, the Samuel Zacks professor of Jewish history, is the director of the university's Jewish studies program. Orwin is a professor of political philosophy and the chair of the Munk Centre's program in political philosophy and international affairs.

They appeared at a seminar titled One State, Two States: Can the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict be Resolved?

Penslar, though conceding that the current prospects for peace are at a low ebb, touted the two-state solution as a plausible "cornerstone" of peace.

He said this approach is supported in both Israel and the Arab world, adding sombrely that Israel can't afford to grant Palestinian refugees the right of return.

Considering other options on the table, he dismissed the one-state solution as neither feasible nor imminent, and he described a Palestinian confederation with Jordan as a non-starter.

Penslar suggested that the Palestinian business class is particularly well disposed toward peace. "This group needs to be strengthened so that its voice can be heard," he recommended.

Clifford Orwin

The status quo is not an option, said Penslar, co-editor of Jewish Social Studies and the Journal of Israeli History and the author of books on Israel and the Zionist movement. As he put it, "The status quo won't work and will not lead to stability."

Warning that the Palestinians are not a "quiet people" who'll accept occupation and subjugation lightly, Penslar said they have continually fought for their independence and statehood.

He cited, among other events, the 1936-39 Arab Revolt and the first and second Palestinian uprisings.

Derek Penslar

Penslar took note of the long saga of Palestinian rejectionism of Israel, but argued there is still a chance for peace.

Calling Israel's policy of building settlements in the territories a "fundamentally misguided" one, he said that the cost of maintaining them has risen exponentially, while the majority of Israeli Jews want to end Israel's occupation of the West Bank.

Orwin, in his opening remarks, declared that neither a one-state or a two-state solution offers a credible way out of the present morass.

From a Zionist point of view, the one-state alternative is intolerable because it would mean the end of the Jewish state. Yet the two-state solution is "unacceptable" to Arabs, he claimed without elaborating.

Orwin said that Israel is "stuck" with the status quo because there are no "serious" Palestinian partners. But where the status quo will lead cannot be foretold.

Nevertheless, Israel is obligated to embrace a two-state solution, he said. Orwin, however, held out little hope that Israeli territorial concessions would ever please the Arabs.

An Israeli peace agreement with the Palestinians is inconceivable due to the fact that the Palestinian camp is ideologically and politically divided along Fatah-Hamas lines, he pointed out.

Further, Palestinian moderates are very weak and loath to state their positions publicly. Palestinian incitement against Israel poses an "enormous problem," too, he said.

Citing an example, he mentioned a computer centre that had been named in honour of a suicide bomber.

Taking up the issue of Israeli settlements in the West Bank, Orwin said they can only be regarded as an obstacle to peace if peace is really possible. Yet Israel should refrain from expanding existing settlements, he commented, saying they are "killing" its image.

Placing himself momentarily in Palestinian shoes, Orwin mused, "If you were a Palestinian Arab, you most certainly would hate the Jews."

Acknowledging that the Palestinians have been displaced from their homes, he agreed they have good reason to be intransigent.

Nonetheless, he stated, Israel would be "crazy" to bow to the Palestinian demand for a right of return.

David Koschitzky focuses on the future

Two-year term as UJA Federation Board Chair comes to an end

By Daniel Horowitz

Although David Koschitzky's last address as chair of UJA Federation's Board was an opportunity to discuss past accomplishments, his focus was clearly on the future of Jewish Toronto.

"Our community has dedicated itself to nurturing our members; everything we have done, and everything we do, is dedicated to ensuring that the next generation understands and values its heritage," said Koschitzky in his outgoing address before 250 spectators at UJA's Annual General Meeting, held on November 16 at Events On The Park. "If properly nurtured with our traditions and culture, our children will grow up to represent, respect and be proud of our unique heritage and distinctive community."

Koschitzky spoke with pride when discussing some of the achievements during his term.

"During the last two years we have increased our subsidies to Jewish education by more than 30 percent," he said. "And we are committed to these subsidies keeping pace with inflation. Our commitment to the elderly, especially our large and growing Holocaust survivor community, has increased significantly while our determination to protect Israel against coordinated acts of blacklisting, demonization and slander has never been stronger."

"David is a bright, caring and warm individual who really understands people and has united different elements of the community together," says David Engel, a past UJA chair, and the president of UIA Federations Canada. "For the Jewish community here, at home, he has been a youthful leader who understands the importance of Jewish education and a Jewish neshama (soul). He has brought that focus to the community with an understanding of what's best for our community and our growth."

"Following David as the chair, I clearly have big shoes to fill," said Alan Winer, who began his term as chair of the Board. Replacing Winer as UJA's new Senior Vice Chair is Elizabeth Wolfe.

"Our new strategic plan places a priority on affliation, identity and literacy," explained Winer. "This means that we must look at solutions in different ways than the past; it is not business as usual. We will need to focus on partnerships with our agencies, they are the front line soldiers who impact and serve thousands of community members. Most importantly, we are widening portals of entry for Jews in Toronto to become connected to our community and to Israel. We are dedicated to building a Diaspora community that continues to be considered one of the strongest and most dedicated to Jewish values and to the state of israel."

"When you look back a the last two years of David's leadership, not only has UJA done well for our Jewish community here in Toronto, but I think David has helped put Toronto out in the forefront of the Diaspora," said Ted Sokolsky, president & CEO, UJA Federation. "David is truly a Renaissance man in the sense that he has such a wide range of knowledge and understanding. He is an incredibly deep, thoughtful, inspiring and caring man but underneath it all you know that there is tremendous strength. He's still a young man, and after seeing what he's accomplished in Toronto, I think there is a big world out there ready for his leadership."

From Sea to Sand: an Israeli mission like no other

Even before the creation of the State of Israel, and certainly since its establishment, the unique and powerful bond between Jewish Toronto and the land of our people has been unbreakable.

Now, from January 11 to 17, 2010, members of the Greater Toronto Area's Jewish community have the opportunity to enjoy Israel's unique spirit, history and culture, and experience that unshakable bond in person, aboard UJA Federation's From Sea to Sand Mission to Israel.

From Eilat to Jerusalem, this uniquely exciting, informative and affordable mission to Israel will provide participants with the chance to meet some of Israel's top decision-makers, spend Shabbat in Jerusalem, visit Yad Vashem Holocaust History Museum, experience the geological wonders of Timna Park and the Ramon Crater, and see, firsthand, how their dollars are being put to use in Toronto's flourishing partnership region of Eilat/Eilot.

UJA Federation's From Sea to Sand Mission to Israel promises to be a unique and memorable experience.

With a minimum household gift of $500 to United Jewish Appeal's current Campaign 2010, the cost of this remarkable experience is only $2,675.

Start January off on the right foot; make good on that New Year's resolution to visit Israel. The Sea to Sand Mission is an experience you soon won't forget.

An information session will be held on Tuesday, December 1, at 7:30 p.m. at the Prosserman JCC, Room 123, Sherman Campus (4588 Bathurst Street). For more information, or to RSVP for the meeting, please contact Iris Glesinger-Lichtinshtein at iglesinger@ujafed.org or by calling 416.635.2883 ext. 5177.

Experts discuss challenges facing Jewish state

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

What started as a panel discussion on "Israel and the War Over Truth" turned into a temporarily heated war of words between audience members and panelists as the topic of settler activity in Israel was raised.

Some 150 people came to Yeshivat Or Chaim on Nov. 7 to hear MP Irwin Cotler, Rabbi Meir Soloveichik, Wall Street Journal foreign affairs columnist Bret Stephens and Prof. Michael Walzer speak about war, human rights and morality. Elliott Malamet, director of the Jewish teacher education program at York University, moderated the discussion.

The panel discussion was part of Torah in Motion's eighth annual Renewing Our Spirit conference, held in memory of Nathan Krauss, and sponsored by the Krauss family.

During the discussion, Walzer, professor emeritus of social science at the Institute for Advanced Study in New Jersey, raised the subject of Israel's settler movement.

"The greatest threat to the existence of a Jewish state is the far right in Israel and the settler movement," he said, to a mingling of clapping and boos from the audience.

"The goal of the settler movement, which they are rapidly achieving, is to make a two-state solution impossible. If the two-state solution is impossible, then we will be faced with one state… And that one state will not be for long a Jewish state."

"Your logic is bogus!" someone in the audience cried out, which led some people to start yelling at each other.

At that point, Malamet intervened with some stern words. "Just because you hear something you don't agree with doesn't mean the rules of discourse get thrown out the window," he said.

Walzer also spoke about the importance of morality when fighting wars against guerrilla and terrorist groups.

"In these kinds of wars, where people ruthlessly exploit the civilian population, if you become like them, which is what they want you to do, you will lose," he said.

"If we fight well, with patience and skill and determination, we can win."

Stephens, who from 2002 to 2004 was the youngest-ever editor-in-chief of the Jerusalem Post, discussed his worry that Israel's focus on moral performance has clouded its judgment.

"By becoming so concerned about our own moral performance, we lose sight of a basic objective, or we lose sight of the facts of our enemies' moral performance, and we lose sight, too, of an overriding need to defeat these people, and to kill them, more often than not," he said.

"I've been to Gaza many times. In Gaza, Hamas is overwhelmingly popular. And that fact needs to be taken into account considering our overall moral question."

Stephens also touched on worldwide perceptions of Israel, disagreeing with Walzer, who stated that Israel has support in Europe.

"One of the facts that I find most striking is that as Israel has become increasingly discriminating and careful in the way it goes about conducting its operations vis-à-vis Hamas, Hezbollah, etc., the fury of the rest of the world has increased," he said.

Irwin Cotler

Bret Stephens

Michael Walzer

"I do not agree with [Walzer's] characterization… that Israel has friends in Europe," he added, to applause from the audience. "It's depressing for me to consider what is happening on that continent vis-à-vis reviews of Israel. I think among the older generation there is a vestigial sense of admiration or obligation toward Israel, whether out of guilt or whatever. Among my generation, there's no restraint.

"My fear is an Israel that has to wait upon the 'supreme emergency' in order to act with decision and vigour… I think there's a danger in saying we have to wait upon events, we have to wait, in effect, until the Iranians are at our throats before we act, because you're rolling the dice on your children's future that way."

Rabbi Soloveichik – associate rabbi of Congregation Kehilath Jeshurun in New York and a doctoral student in philosophy of religion at Princeton University – discussed the rules of war in Jewish tradition.

"Every innocent life, and this is in the original axiom of Jewish ethics, is of infinite value, therefore the taking of life is sinful, and that sin cannot be committed for any reason," he said. "[However] the Jewish sensitivity to the preciousness of human life mandates that if a pursuer can't be stopped and the pursued saved…without the loss of life, then that is the course of action that must be pursued.

"If one society is threatened by another, if that threat can be negated by targeting the direct source of the threat… then that course must be pursued. But if the only way to neutralize the threat is with collateral damage to the civilians, then a state, acting in self-defence of its citizens, which is essentially the equivalent of a state acting in defence of itself, is entitled and indeed obligated to act to neutralize that threat.

"If necessary, the death of civilians is cause for sorrow, but not guilt. And so the Israeli action is tragic, but not sinful."

Cotler, an international human rights lawyer and Canada's justice minister and attorney general from 2003 to 2006, focused on how Israel is being delegitimized.

"Israel, like any other state, is responsible for any violations of human rights and humanitarian law," he said. "The important point here is, like any other state… Israel is being singled out for differential and discriminatory treatment in enforcement and application of such law.

"The problem [is] when they single out only one state in the international community and require that state to be held accountable while all others, and in particular terrorist states, are given a kind of exculpatory immunity."

He also discussed the constant referrals to Israel as an apartheid state.

"Calling Israel an apartheid state is not simply using a derogatory metaphor, because apartheid is defined as a crime against humanity… to refer to Israel, and indict it as, an apartheid state, as a crime against humanity, you are effectively calling for the dismantling of that state… But if that is not enough, you refer also to Israel as a Nazi state, so the dismantling of that state is not only something that is required because it is a crime against humanity but it is morally and legally obligatory because an apartheid, Nazi state has no right to exist and the international committee has every obligation to do away with it."

Cotler noted that 80 per cent of the resolutions of the United Nations Council of Human Rights "have singled out one member state – Israel – while the major human rights violators – Iran, Sudan, and the like – enjoy exculpatory immunity. Not one resolution against them."

He added that "at every council hearing there's an agenda. Item seven – a permanent agenda item seven – speaks of Israeli human rights violations in the occupied territories. Agenda item number eight speaks of human rights violations in the rest of the world. There is a permanent agenda item singling out Israel for condemnation, even before the meeting or hearing begins."

Cotler also noted that each year, the UN has 20 or more resolutions condemning Israel – more than those against the rest of the world combined.

On the topic of Iran, he noted that it "has not only been a serious violator of UN council resolutions, but it's been a serial deceiver in terms of its lies and deception… Iran has already committed the crime of incitement to genocide…The governments can initiate an interstate complaint against Iran before the international court of justice.

"I'm a great believer in naming and shaming, and turning the delegitimization around."

Palestinians not ready for peace: Gush Etzion mayor

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Palestinians aren't ready for peace, claims the mayor of a bloc of more than a dozen Israeli towns in the West Bank.

"For the Palestinians, Judea and Samaria are not the only issues on the table," said Shaul Goldstein, the mayor of the Gush Etzion Regional Council in a recent interview in Toronto.

"It's not just about the so-called occupation," added Goldstein, who was here to argue that Israel must never relinquish Gush Etzion, which was seized by the Israeli army in the Six Day War. "The conflict with the Palestinians is about Israel."

Israeli territorial concessions will make no difference to the Palestinians, said Goldstein, a resident of Neve Daniel, 12 kilometres south of Jerusalem.

"My Palestinian friends tell me, 'There is no room for a non-Muslim state in the region.' This generation of Palestinians doesn't accept Israel's existence. If I thought that peace with the Palestinians was possible, I'd be prepared for territorial compromise. But concessions by Israel will not bring peace."

"We gave them Gaza and what did we get in return? Missiles and terror," he declared, referring to Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip in 2005, which was followed by a steady barrage of Hamas and Islamic Jihad rocket attacks on Israeli communities adjacent to the border.

As he reads the situation, the mainstream Palestinian leadership, headed by the Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, could not even enforce a peace treaty. "Abbas is more of a partner than other Palestinian leaders, but he doesn't have the power and the legitimacy that can lead to peace."

Yet even Abbas is a problematic figure, he said. He demands the right of return for Palestinian refugees, wants eastern Jerusalem as the capital of a Palestinian state and doesn't recognize Israel as a Jewish state.

Claiming that an Israeli pullout from the West Bank would be counter-productive, Goldstein said it would imperial Israel's existence by bringing Iranian influence still closer to Israel's doorstep. "We can't gamble with our future."

Saying that a two-state solution is based on myth rather than reality, he observed, "The Palestinian state is in Jordan. That's the only realistic solution."

Professing not to be concerned by the argument that Israel's continued occupation of the West Bank may well dilute its Jewish character and thereby produce a binational state and a demographic crisis, Goldstein said the problem can be resolved if the Palestinians are given the right to vote in elections in Jordan.

Yet he acknowledged that Jordan is adamantly opposed to this scenario.

In principle, he noted, Israel should formally annex the West Bank. "But not now. The time is not right. Israel annexed eastern Jerusalem and the Golan Heights. Did it help us?"

Asked if he would be comfortable living under Palestinian rule, he said no. Implying that a Palestinian state would be autocratic, he said, "I couldn't live in a non-democratic state."

Shaul Goldstein

A Likud party supporter, Goldstein said he's not certain whether Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was sincere when he recently endorsed the concept of Palestinian statehood.

"I hope not. I know most of his party is against it. Netanyahu is manoeuvring under U.S. pressure. But he made a strategic mistake, and I hope he corrects it some day."

Goldstein said too much of a fuss is made about Israel's settlements in the West Bank, since they comprise only about five per cent of its total land mass.

Gush Etzion, situated in the Judean hills, consists of about 750 square kilometres, representing approximately 12 per cent of the West Bank.

The first known attempt by Jews in the modern era to settle Gush Etzion was in the late 1920s. The community dissolved in the face of economic hardship and Palestinian resistance. In 1932, a Jewish businessman, Shmuel Holtzmann, donated funds to build a kibbutz, Kfar Etzion. But the 1936 Arab revolt forced the Jewish settlers to abandon it.

During the 1940s, the right-wing Orthodox Bnei Akiva movement and the left-wing, irreligious Hashomer Hatzair founded several kibbutzim in the area, but they were besieged and overrun by Arab forces.

In the wake of the Six Day War, with the West Bank in Israel's hands, Bnei Akiva activists petitioned the Israeli government to settle Gush Etzion. The Israeli prime minister of the day, Levi Eshkol, agreed. Construction of the first kibbutz commenced in September 1967.

Today, the Gush Etzion Regional Council serves 16,000 residents and comprises 19 settlements, among which are Alon Shvut, Bat Ayin, Carmel Tzur, Gvaot, Elazar, Kfar Etzion, Tekoa, Rosh Tzurim and Kedar. The settlements of Efrat and Betar, with 40,000 inhabitants, are geographically inside the borders of the council, but aren't members.

Goldstein, 50, was in Toronto to raise funds for various projects in Gush Etzion and to underline its importance to Israel.

"The Land of Israel stretches from the Jordan Valley to the Mediterranean Sea," he said. "It's the property of the Jewish people, though I recognize that there are Palestinians here. But they don't undermine our rights to the land."

Last June, Goldstein showed the former president of the United States, Jimmy Carter, around Gush Etzion. After his visit, Carter said he envisioned the prospect of an Israeli withdrawal from Gush Etzion. Israel has said repeatedly it has no intention of giving up Gush Etzion.

Israeli rabbis' group fights for human rights

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israeli civil society is replete with organizations championing the cause of human rights, so is there really a need for another such organization representing rabbinic authorities?

Rabbi Arik Ascherman, executive director of Rabbis for Human Rights, leans back in his chair, ponders the question for a moment, and begins by acknowledging something that was not asked: "Much bloodshed and strife is due to nationalism and religion."

But as for human rights, "as a religious person, it's part of who I am and feeds my soul. Whether we like it or not, religion is an incredibly powerful force, especially in the Middle East.

"When I grew up, " said the Erie, Penn., native, "the basic part of being a Jew was being immersed with universal human rights and concern for justice… North American Jews identified with Judaism and justice… It was a profound shock that in Israel these things that were axiomatic to me were not shared by most Israelis, particularly religious Israelis."

Rabbi Arik Ascherman

Ascherman, who was in Toronto recently for the Reform movement's biennial conference, said polls show most Israelis share RHR's concern for human rights, if not the religiosity associated with the group.

RHR, a 21-year-old organization that consists of 120 rabbis, mostly Conservative and Reform, has adopted a dual mandate of "preventing and reducing human rights abuses" and influencing "the intellectual life of Israelis that there's another equally Jewish, authoritative, textually-based humanistic view of the Jewish tradition."

The first verses of the Torah says that all humanity was created in God's image, and for RHR, that means treating fellow human beings equally, he said.

With that worldview in mind, RHR has championed the causes of foreign workers and refugees from Darfur. It has also sought "economic justice," raised concerns over the "social gap in Israel" and the territorial struggle between Israelis and Palestinians, and has referred to Jewish tradition to back up its points.

Though Israel doesn't have a constitution like Canada or the United States that sets out fundamental rights, courts have looked at its Declaration of Independence as setting out the country's basic principles, including freedom, justice and peace as envisioned by the prophets of Israel.

Referring to the book of Genesis, Rabbi Ascherman pointed out that the patriarch Abraham argued with God over the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. "It showed that Abraham was concerned about justice for every human being, whether Jewish or not."

In dealing with modern issues, such as Sudanese refugees, "making war on the poor" or the conflict in Gaza, "I often ask myself, is there an Abraham to ask God, 'Should not the judge of all the earth do justly?'"

Ascherman, who has served as the organization's executive director for 15 years, said RHR "shoots in all directions" when it sees human rights violations. It has launched court cases – in one instance, to prevent seizure of land in the West Bank for settlers – and it has partnered with other organizations to champion a cause, sent "volunteers as human shields to protect Palestinians from settler violence," lobbied government ministers, worked with international diplomats and practised civil disobedience.

One issue that has drawn international attention was the effort to halt the demolition of Palestinian buildings in east Jerusalem. His act of civil disobedience earned him a criminal conviction, although his record was expunged in exchange for community service, he said.

RHR has called on the Israeli attorney general to initiate an independent investigation about alleged Israeli actions during the Gaza war. RHR made the suggestion prior to the Goldstone report, which made a similar recommendation about Israel and Hamas.

Rabbi Ascherman said that until nine months ago, "I'd have said, very much so, that I never felt marginalized in Israeli society." Polls showed many Israelis agreed with RHR's principles of promoting human rights and serving as a watchdog organization.

But "since Gaza, I feel more marginalized… If you question how the war was fought, it's assumed you do not support Sderot and Ashkelon. Even asking questions regarding what happened in Gaza is taken as equivalent to being traitorous."

Rabbi Ascherman suggested there may have been alternatives to the war, and he stressed Judaism advocates a doctrine of using minimal force, so as not to injure innocents.

"We see very clearly that we support Israel's right to defend itself. We care about Sderot and Ashkelon. But when you ask these questions, that doesn't come across."

Jews unique in often siding with enemies: prof

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's a scene that's become familiar at many anti-Israel marches and rallies and even at film festivals that are meant, ostensibly, to celebrate Israel's achievements: Jewish protesters siding with Israel's opponents.

Ruth Wisse has examined the phenomenon and finds that unlike other minorities who find their home countries under attacks, "Jews are the only minority whose members invite attack and join boycotts against their own people."

Wisse, Martin Peretz professor of Yiddish literature and professor of comparative literature at Harvard University, was in Toronto recently to deliver a public lecture as part of the Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman Centre for Jewish Learning at Holy Blossom Temple. Her topic: "Jews and power, why and how we often get it wrong."

In an interview with The CJN, Wisse suggested the strengths that underlie Israel's success – entrepreneurship, imagination, inventiveness – have a flip side, a weakness that is part of the same profile.

"What Jews suffer from," she said, "is not the corruption of power, but the corruption of powerlessness." That leads to inordinate self-criticism.

Ruth Wisse

"You never see German and Polish film festivals used by the minority in question as an opportunity to attack their own people," she said, contrasting it with a Jewish festival in San Francisco that ran a film lauding pro-Palestinian activist Rachel Corrie.

Many Jews side with their people's enemies, she continued, "because no other people are under attack like Jews and Jews may acquire a great deal of power – they don't have the ability to defend their achievements.

"Jews have been a no-fail target in history because it's always possible to destroy them and there's no price to pay."

That produces a reaction in which some Jews will "try to get out of this position. And if you have a cheerful, liberal view of life, if you believe all problems can be resolved, all crises can be rationally alleviated, [and] if so many Arabs blame your fellow Jews, you pretend to solve the problem."

Jews who feel under attack "deal with this by trying to say, 'If only we did this…,'" she said.

It's a pattern that has occurred before: facing anti-Semitism in 19th-century Germany, many Jews responded by saying, "If only we became more German, or dressed the same."

Jews today must answer the question, "Do you have enough moral confidence to say that the enemy is the aggressor and demand that the aggression cease?" she said.

People on the left are particularly prone to siding with the Jews' enemies, she continued. Marxism took the view that Jews were a corrupting force behind capitalism and stood in the way of a great international, egalitarian world.

"The hard left has always been disturbingly anti-Jewish and against Jewish nationalism. They felt it was reactionary to try to get our own land."

Wisse suggested Jews must first recognize the problem and develop the moral confidence to resist it.

"Jews have no choice but to be the fighting frontline of the democratic west, of the lands of freedom, of what used to be the free world, and not only militarily. More and more, they should do it politically.

"We're not living up to our responsibility if we fail in this. You can't pretend you're the problem when you're not. You can't pretend you have the solution to the problem when you don't. It's not moral, it's not true," she said.

TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL PRESENTS
THE DEBT
Inspiring a Hollywood remake with Helen Mirren, The Debt is an intense espionage thriller about three retired Mossad agents who share a dark secret. Three decades earlier, these agents became national heroes for capturing and killing the "Surgeon of Birkenau," a monstrous Nazi war criminal. But now, as one of the agents publishes her memoirs, their secret suddenly starts to unravel. As the film expertly weaves between the present and the past, we begin to see what really happened 30 years ago. Featuring a wonderful lead performance by the legendary Gila Almagor (Summer of Aviya), The Debt is a stylishly directed story of revenge that questions the meaning of heroism. Hebrew, German, Russian with English subtitles.

Anti-Zionist Jewish leftists are part of a line stretching back to Marx

By SALLY F. ZERKER

Guest Voice

Not too long ago, I bumped into an old acquaintance of mine who had also been involved, as I was, with the now (sadly) defunct organization, Canadian Professors for Peace in the Middle East. In the course of our greetings and renewal of friendship, he asked me a very telling and important question. Did I have an answer why leftists, both Jew and gentile, have become the most strident anti-Israel and anti-Jewish voices. I did not have an immediately satisfactory answer. I had to think about it, and specifically about the current phenomenon of Jewish leftists' obvious hatred of Israel. Thought brought me to the realization that there is indeed a strong precedent for leftist anti-Semitism.

The father of all modern leftist thought, Karl Marx, was a virulent anti-Semite. His hateful diatribe against Jews is found in his essay On the Jewish Question. Marxist apologists try to defend him by the spurious argument that it is not Jews as such that he hates, but rather the bourgeois values that are exemplified in some Jewish practices. Not true! Listen to the real Marx, and I quote from his essay: "What is the profane basis of Judaism? Practical need, self-interest. What is the worldly cult of the Jew? Huckstering. What is his worldly god? Money. Very well: then in emancipating itself from huckstering and money, and thus from real and practical Judaism, our age would emancipate itself... the emancipation of the Jew is the emancipation of mankind from Judaism." (The emphatic italics are Marx's).

It becomes evident on reading On the Jewish Question that Marx is the classic anti-Semite, not unlike the writers of the fabricated Elders of Zion pamphlet, who see the world captured and destroyed by Jewish values, practices and conspiracies. Let the world be rid of the Jews and all will be well.

I believe there's a reasonable psychological explanation for Marx's hatred of Jews. No matter what Marx did in his life, he simply could not shed being branded a Jew. To this day, when Marx's name comes up in the media, and even in academic articles, inevitably he is referred to as a Jew. But Marx did not see himself as a Jew, and for good reason. When he was born in 1818, his mother had not yet converted to Christianity but his father, who had changed his name from Herschel Levi to Heinrich Marx, had already done so. And Marx, the father, had his six living children baptized some years before his wife followed the family into Christianity. Karl was six years old when he was converted to Christianity.

Karl Marx had no connection with his Jewish grandparents, nor with a Jewish community in Trier, his hometown. On the contrary, with the help of his father, he went to great length to associate himself with the most prominent Christian family in the city, the Von Westphalens. Ludwig Von Westphalen was the chief administrative officer in Trier, which essentially made him the government of the city. Karl was only 17 when he wooed and won the hand of Jenny Von Westphalen, Ludwig's daughter, who was eight years older than Karl. Thus, Karl Marx had all the right credentials to be looked upon as a proper German, cleansed of the handicap of Jewish baggage. But it was not to be. He would be looked upon with the prejudiced eye of the bigot much as any other Jew might be. Hence, when he wrote about Jews and Judaism, he did so with the clear desire to dissociate himself from all those "awful" Jewish types.

In my opinion, Karl Marx is the ancestor of our current crop of Jewish leftist, with this distinction. The modern leftist has to announce the Jewish connection because he or she has the same purpose as Marx, which is to distinguish him/herself from the mainstream Zionist position of the vast majority of Jews. They, too, fervently wish that they not be seen to be like those "awful" Jewish types.

Marx may have be an early antecedent to modern Jewish leftists hostile to Israel and Jews broadly, but not the only one. I remember when the United Jewish Peoples Order (UJPO) – the Jewish branch of the Communist Party – was headquartered on Brunswick Street, just north of College Street, here in Toronto. It was right beside the Talmud Torah I attended and was only steps away from my father's shtibl synagogue. Indeed, it was within range of many Jewish religious institutions. That proximity is important, because on Yom Kippur, when Jews of different affiliations were at one in their solemnity and their fasting, UJPO Jews made sure to show their separateness and disdain for all those "awful" Jewish types by catering a boisterous feast in their neighbouring quarters on that holy day.

Jewish members of the Communist Party had good reason to draw a line between themselves and the Jewish community at large. After all, they had to form their own branch of the party, because it, like the rest of Canadian society at the time, was blatantly anti-Semitic. There was no place for Jews in the regular Communist Party, but the ideologically committed Jews found an alternative in their own Jewish sub-grouping. Therefore, it was doubly important that those "good and desirable" Communists know that the UJPO Communists are not to be confused with those "awful" Jewish types.

In looking for antecedents to today's Jewish leftists, I'm sure that Zionists in eastern Europe who experienced the animosity of the Bund – the Jewish leftist organization committed to Poland and Russia and opposed to a national homeland for the Jewish people – would have no trouble recognizing their heirs. Old Bundists never give up, even when the Bund has been disbanded. Marek Edelman was a case in point. He was a survivor of the Warsaw Ghetto battle and a member of the Bund. He stayed in Poland to create socialism in Poland, but of course ran into difficulties as a Jew there, but to his dying day, which was just this past Oct. 3, he wrote and said vile things about Israel.

There was one time when the left, Jewish and non-Jewish alike, had glowing things to say about Israel. That occurred when Soviet leader Josef Stalin was in favour of the establishment of Israel, believing as he did that the early socialist leanings of the kibbutzim founders would create a vassal state for the Soviet Union in the Middle East. He had reason to hope, because the left in Israel at that time were indeed devoted to Stalin, when some even hung his picture in their kibbutz dining rooms. But Israel didn't follow the Stalin plan, and so that was the end of pro-Israel sentiment by leftists. As Stalin went, so went his followers, and thus the move was on for their reversal to their traditional anti-Israel, anti-Jewish facade.

I think I found the answer to my friend's question. The reason for the current crop of hostile anti-Semitic, anti-Israel leftists is that they come from a long and "distinguished" tradition, and one should expect nothing better of them.

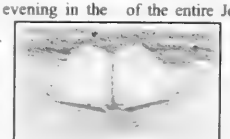
Jewish Life

Don't let your self intrude

By RABBI MICHAEL SKOBAC



Rabbinic Reflections

Facing his brother's wrath, Jacob leaves his parents and heads to Charan, his mother's hometown. On the way, he beds down for the evening in the wilderness and has a profound dream of angels ascending and descending a ladder stretching from earth to heaven. During this vision, God appears to Jacob and blesses him. Upon awakening, he exclaims, "Indeed, God was in this place, and I did not know."

The Rebbe of Radomsk, in his collection of homilies Tifferes Shlomo, notes that a literal reading of the Hebrew can be rendered, "And I, I did not know." The reason that Jacob was able to have an experience of the Divine was that he didn't let his self, his ego get in the way. Rabbi Lawrence Kushner's wonderful book exploring this biblical passage cites the Rebbe from Kotzk, who takes Moses' declaration to the Jewish people in Deuteronomy (5:5), "I stand between you and God" as making a similar point. It is our "I," our being self-absorbed, that inhibits a genuinely full relationship with God.

Moses is described in Deuteronomy as the greatest prophet who will ever live. It is precisely because Moses was the most humble person, we're told in the book of Numbers, that he was able to reach the apex of prophecy.

When the very last verse of the Pentateuch makes reference to the great deeds that Moses performed in the eyes of the entire Jewish nation, Rashi singles out his smashing the tablets of the Ten Commandments after seeing the people worshipping the Golden Calf. It isn't immediately clear why this act would be considered Moses' greatest.

The Talmud relates that Shimon Amsoni was famous for having interpreted the countless times the Hebrew word et appears in the Bible. (This particle appears before the direct object of a sentence and has no real translation.) He asserted that this word extended the idea stated in the verse to include additional information. He had a huge problem, however, when reaching the verse in Deuteronomy (6:13), "You shall fear et the Lord your God." Assuming that the awe of God can't be extended to others, he abandoned his theory. "Just as I received reward for explicating them, I will receive reward for retracting!" he exclaimed.

Ultimately, Rabbi Akiva rescued Shimon Amsoni's work by teaching that the word et in this verse comes to teach the respect we should have for Torah scholars. We may ask what led Rabbi Akiva to such a conclusion? What was his source for this teaching? It seems that his inspiration was Shimon Amsoni himself! A lesser person would have been so invested in preserving their work that they would have come up with some solution to the problem. The old reliable fudge factor would be wheeled out, and they could breath a sigh of relief. But Shimon Amsoni was so dedicated to truth over self that he did the only thing possible – he walked away from his life's work. Rabbi Akiva believed that people such as this deserve our reverence.

Everything in Moses' life led up to the moment that he brought the Jewish people to the foot of Mount Sinai where they would receive the Torah. In the wake of this incredible moment, the people panic when Moses doesn't descend from the mountain when they expected him to appear, and they turn to a molten idol as an intermediary to God. Moses is shocked by their revelry when he finally descends and smashes the tablets of the Decalogue. Everything he worked for is broken to pieces.

How tempting it would have been to come up with some kind of justification for what the people were doing in order to save his work. But like Shimon Amsoni, Moses realized that it wasn't about him. His greatness was manifested by not letting his self get in the way of what truly needed to be done.

Fair pricing in Jewish law

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Considering that there are more mitzvot in Torah in the realm of monetary matters than any other, it shouldn't surprise us that many of the stories of Sefer Bereshit, whose narrative serves as the framework within which our legal code could be given, revolves around these "mundane" issues.

Thus we have the Torah's long description of the purchase of a burial place for Sarah, and Jacob's travails under his unethical boss, Laban. Undoubtedly the story that seems to be the most perplexing is the purchase of the birthright by Jacob from his famished brother Esau. While it's hard to properly value the sale of a birthright – since many of its rights and obligations are intangible – it would seem that Jacob unfairly took advantage of his brother.

Even if Esau willingly sold his rights, it doesn't appear to be exemplary behaviour for our patriarch, who is meant to be the embodiment of emet, truth. While most commentaries explain that it was necessary for Jacob to acquire the birthright from one who "despised it" and that sometimes one must fight fire with fire, Jacob suffered greatly as the victim of trickery by Laban and by his sons vis-a-vis Joseph. Even a justified lie can have severe consequences.

The transaction between Jacob and Esau raises the issue of parlaying one's circumstances for monetary benefit. The Talmud, in dealing with a criminal no less, rules that despite his nefarious intent, he may not be taken advantage of. The case deals with a ferryman who overcharges an absconding thief and rules that the thief may actually recover the excess costs, despite the fact that as far as the criminal is concerned, he would be willing to pay almost any price for transportation to "safety."

Yet, objectively speaking, the price charge is exorbitant and taking advantage of the unique circumstances of the other would be immoral. While from a moral perspective, the ferryman should not aid and abet the thief's escape, talmudic law deals with real people and real cases, and thus often must rule on less than ideal situations. Of course, by denying the ferryman the right to profit on the criminal's ill-gotten gain, he is more likely to act in a moral fashion and refuse to help a criminal escape.

However, the Talmud in a seemingly contradictory ruling states that there is no law of ona'ah (price fraud) regarding the "price of a horse and weaponry in the battlefield." With one's life in danger, one would pay any price for protection. The lucky vendor is just applying the laws of supply and demand to, pardon the pun, make a killing.

What distinguishes this case from the former is that here the market conditions have changed. In times of war, all will pay a greater price for security, whereas only the absconding criminal would be willing to pay more for his "airfare." For all other market participants, the excessive price is just that, and to engage in price discrimination based on individual circumstances is unwarranted. (For a more complete treatment of the above, see Aaron Levine's Case Studies in Jewish Business Ethics, pages 157-160).

Nonetheless, it's interesting to note that the battlefield case isn't quoted by the major codes of Jewish law and is rejected by many authorities, who affirm that taking advantage of "fate" to overcharge is morally objectionable.

This discussion has crucial implications – for example in the most complex issue of pricing of medications. How does one balance the necessity – both monetarily and to ensure investment in continuing research – of corporate profits and affordability? The complexity of this issue is further exacerbated by the ruling that one is allowed to benefit – almost at any price – from the fruit of one's intellectual achievements.

Justice Rand played key role in Israel's statehood

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A Canadian Supreme Court judge who harboured jaundiced views about Jews played an integral role in Israel's creation.

Justice Ivan C. Rand, the Canadian representative on the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP), was "the handmaiden" to Israel's birth in 1948, says William Kaplan, author of Canadian Maverick: The Life and Times of Ivan C. Rand, published by the University of Toronto Press this month.

In 1947, UNSCOP issued a majority report recommending the termination of the British mandate in Palestine and its partition into a Jewish state and an Arab state. The recommendation paved the way for the United Nations' historic decision on Nov. 29, 1947, to endorse a two-state solution in Palestine, which was coveted by Jews and Palestinian Arabs.

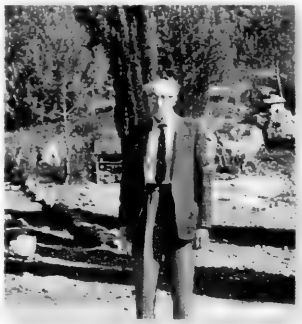
The partition resolution, supported by Jews but opposed by Arabs, was of major significance. Aside from being the first major Zionist victory since the 1917 Balfour Declaration, it formed the legal basis for Israel's legitimacy as a sovereign nation, said Kaplan, a lawyer, in an interview last week.

UNSCOP was established after Britain placed the future of Palestine before the United Nations. Its mandate was to investigate the causes of violence in Palestine and tender proposals for a lasting solution. Its membership comprised 11 middle powers without vital interests in the Middle East or a large and active Jewish community: Australia, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Guatemala, India, Iran, Holland, Peru, Sweden, Uruguay and Yugoslavia.

The Canadian prime minister, Mackenzie King, selected Rand as Canada's delegate.

Born in New Brunswick, Rand earned a law degree at Harvard University. In 1924, he was named New Brunswick's attorney general, and in 1943, he was appointed to the Supreme Court. He was also the founding dean of the University of Western Ontario's law school and devised the Rand formula, an important principle in labour law.

He arrived in Palestine with limited and one-sided knowledge of the conflict that was tearing it apart. Being fresh to the problem, he was tutored by Elizabeth MacCallum, a pro-Arab Mideast expert at the Department of External Affairs in Ottawa.



Ivan Rand visits "his" forest in Jerusalem in 1959.

Rand was, in Kaplan's words, "an intolerant bigot" who had little use for French Canadians, Catholics, Jews and ethnically hyphenated Canadians. His prejudices were such that when his sister married an Acadian, he didn't talk to him for more than 30 years.

And although Rand struck down restrictive covenants that prevented property from being sold or rented to Jews, Semites or people of colour, he belonged to clubs with restricted memberships.

By the same token, he was a civil libertarian who acknowledged the legitimate rights of Japanese Canadians during World War II, defended the lawful right to free speech in the case of Communists, and stood up for Jehovah's Witnesses during the Maurice Duplessis era in Quebec.

In short, Rand was a complex, confounding and often contradictory man. "He had a first-rate mind and a third-rate temperament," said Kaplan, who was drawn to him due to his ground-breaking civil liberties judgments.

Rand landed in Palestine in June 1947, determined to treat the conflict even-handedly, even though, as Kaplan noted, he had "shadowy prejudices" against Jews. Rand wrote: "Our object... is quite clear: to satisfy, not the Jew nor the Arab, but the enlightened and intelligent conscience of mankind as represented by the United Nations."

Shortly after his arrival in Palestine, Rand met a Canadian clergyman, William Hull, a pro-Zionist evangelical Christian who greatly influenced him.

Rand was courted by the Zionist leadership, who believed that he was a key UNSCOP delegate. Moshe Shertok, the head of the Jewish Agency, said, "The conversion of this old man was of the utmost importance."

By contrast, local Arab leaders shunned UNSCOP, boycotting the United Nations mission altogether. "If the Arabs had co-operated, it would have been harder for Rand to support partition," speculated Kaplan, who has written two books about the Airbus affair and a children's book about the Holocaust (One More Border).

Rand spent long hours with David Horowitz of the Jewish Agency. Later, Horowitz said that Rand showed an understanding of the relationship between the Holocaust and Zionist objectives.

He also had meetings with such Zionist luminaries as David Ben-Gurion, who would be Israel's first prime minister, and Chaim Weizmann, who would be its first president.

These encounters left a deep impression, as did meetings with Holocaust survivors and visits to Jewish settlements. "He was impressed with Jewish achievements in Palestine," said Kaplan, who was a law professor at the University of Ottawa before going into private practice in Toronto.

In addition, Rand was moved by the plight of the Jewish refugees aboard the ship Exodus – which docked in Haifa when he was there – and disgusted by the brutal manner in which Arabs treated their employees.

Even before leaving Palestine, Rand was convinced that the British Mandate, which he likened to a police state, had failed and had to go.

He didn't think highly of a one-state solution, which was favoured by the Palestinians. As he put it, "The idea of a Holy Land in which both Jews and Arabs will live together peacefully is a possibility beyond the masses of Arabs and Jews."

The only possible option was partition, which the Peel Commission had called for in 1937.

UNSCOP issued separate majority and minority reports. The first report, backed by Canada, recommended partition with a twist: two states linked by an economic union. The second report, supported by India, Iran and Yugoslavia, recommended the establishment of a federal state with Jewish and Arab parts. In Kaplan's view, UNSCOP's scheme was naive, out of touch with reality and fundamentally flawed.

UNSCOP's plan was never implemented, rendered irrelevant by Israel's declaration of independence and the subsequent Arab invasion of the Jewish state.

Despite serious misgivings, the Canadian government supported partition.

Feted by Zionists after the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, Rand accompanied Montreal business mogul Samuel Bronfman to Israel in 1959 to dedicate a forest in Jerusalem in his honour. Rand also made personal contributions to the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

In 1961, he was named national co-chair of Brotherhood Week by the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. "The human race has advanced a great deal in the past century, and man should be able to properly judge qualities of other people rather than exercise prejudice," he proclaimed.

Rand supported Israel to his dying day and admired "new Jews," Israeli soldiers and farmers building "a civilization" and a society with rules.

Prior to his death in 1969, he intended to pay his second visit to Israel.

Nonetheless, Rand – a person who assiduously separated his private and public lives – never altered his general opinion about Jews, though he made exceptions for certain individuals.

In one telling incident, he balked at hiring a Jew at the University of Western Ontario's law faculty, being reluctant to hire a Jewish candidate to replace a Jewish instructor who had passed away. He claimed that a "small town" like London would not abide "too many Jews."

But for all his deep-seated, small-minded prejudices, Rand remained a civil libertarian and never regretted his support for a Jewish state.

Calgary anti-Semitic vandalism now classified as a hate crime

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Recent incidents of anti-Semitic vandalism in Calgary are now being classified as hate crimes, said Const. Brian Denison of the Calgary police.

Earlier this month, a number of synagogues, a private home, bus stops and a Holocaust memorial were hit with anti-Semitic graffiti in Calgary and several Ontario cities.

Until last Tuesday, police in Calgary were calling the acts in that city hate incidents rather than crimes, which led Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) to write a letter to Rick Hanson, the chief of police.

After looking over video surveillance and other evidence, Denison re-classified the acts as "hate-motivated mischief to religious property."

An act is called a hate incident when police don't have enough evidence to prove a crime was committed, Denison said.

"It can be throwing out racial slurs or even putting graffiti on certain things, but not like they did out here. It's very blatant what they were saying."

Congress CEO Bernie Farber said the community had concerns about the classification of the vandalism, which included drawings of swastikas and phrases such as "Kill Jews" and "6 million more."

"We all had concerns, not with the police investigation… but with the manner with which police seem to be reluctant to label this a hate crime," Farber said. "There seems to be a misconception of what a hate crime is and the fear of labelling it by its proper name."

Farber said this fear isn't uncommon among police forces with limited experience with such crimes.

"This is one of the first major incidents in Calgary that they're dealing with in a long, long time," he said.

Apart from the incidents in Calgary, anti-Semitic vandalism also turned up in three Ontario cities earlier this month.

According to Len Rudner, CJC's Ontario regional director, anti-Semitic graffiti was found in the parking garage of a London, Ont., apartment building with a large Jewish population.

A "poorly drawn" swastika was found on Nov. 9, Rudner said, along with the words "Jew, we know you're hiding here, I'm coming to get you."

The parking garage wasn't equipped with security cameras and there were no witnesses, Rudner said, adding that police don't believe the building's residents are in danger.

"Clearly, folks in the community are rightfully upset by such things, and the police responded appropriately," he said. "With no evidence or witnesses, it's difficult [for police] to make progress."

Shuls in Barrie, Ont., and Oshawa, Ont., were also vandalized around the same time.

Police in Barrie have reviewed surveillance tapes from the vandalized shul, but could not find any useful information, Rudner said.

Durham Regional Police are currently investigating the incident in Oshawa but no arrests have been made, said David Selby of the police force.

Calgary police have released surveillance video of one of the suspected vandals approaching a Chabad Lubavitch centre and are asking people with information to call 1-800-222-8477.

Nazi-killing-squad interpreter wins reprieve from court

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

After 13 years before the courts, it's unlikely that Helmut Oberlander has his bags packed and is sitting by the door waiting to be thrown out of the country.

The former interpreter with a Nazi killing squad won another legal battle last week, further delaying any chance he will be deported from Canada for lying about his wartime service.

The Federal Court of Appeal ruled 2-1 that the governor-in-council – the federal cabinet – erred in revoking his citizenship because it didn't properly consider the implied claim he had served in the Einsatzgruppe killing squad under duress, even though it had evidence he was conscripted into the group.

Writing for the court, judge Carolyn Layden-Stevenson said "duress… operates to excuse the complicity so that the complicit individual is exonerated of culpability."

"The question then is whether the record contained sufficient information to oblige the governor-in-council (GIC) to consider that allegation, along with the evidence of conscription and any other relevant evidence, to determine whether the justification of duress is made out, notwithstanding that duress was not the basis of Mr. Oberlander's argument. In my view, there was sufficient evidence in the record to require the GIC to address this issue."

The judge goes on to write, "It is open to the GIC to reject duress as a justification, but it must not ignore it."

Jewish groups were outraged at the ruling, based, as one said, on a "hyper-technical point of interpretation."

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Mark Freiman issued a statement saying, "CJC deplores the decision… It is frustrating that two judges of the Court of Appeal have seen fit to delay yet again a case involving a member of a mobile killing squad that goes back almost 15 years, this time on a hyper-technical point of interpretation.

"Oberlander's defence claimed he was conscripted into the Einsatzgruppe. Cabinet assessed this argument and rejected it in recommending revocation. The Court of Appeal has now decided to send this matter back to cabinet for reconsideration based on its view that cabinet was unreasonable in not assessing essentially this very same excuse under the rubric of 'compulsion,' a concept that Mr. Oberlander himself did not see fit to raise in his own defence.

"Ultimately, the issue is not how he came to be attached to a mobile killing squad, but rather that he then lied about it to gain entry into Canada and to obtain Canadian citizenship."

Congress urged the government to seek leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) called "a reconsideration of Oberlander's status in Canada disappointing, if not shocking."

Winnipeg deals with intermarriage

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The executive director of the Jewish Outreach Institute was kept constantly on the go during a recent visit to Winnipeg.

Rabbi Kerry Olitzky met with synagogue leaders; Jewish Federation of Winnipeg board members; Jewish Child and Family Service (JCFS) staff; Rose and Max Rady Jewish Community Centre staff, the Chesed Shel Emes board; parents of children attending the Hebrew bilingual elementary school program at Brock-Corydon School; a Hillel group; a young leadership training group and members of JACS (Jewish alcoholics, chemically dependent persons and significant-others).

Rabbi Olitzky's Jewish Outreach Institute, which is based in the United States, is an independent organization dedicated to bringing Judaism to interfaith families and the unaffiliated.

His visit to Winnipeg, from Oct. 26 to 28, came about because the organized Jewish community here is grappling with a steep rise in intermarriage rates – currently running at more than 60 per cent of those members of the community who are under 30.

"We were talking about how to make our community more welcoming for interfaith families and the unaffiliated, and Kerry's name came up," said Faye Rosenberg Cohen, the federation's planning director.

Rabbi Olitzky's presentations were well received. "I thought that he was very good," said Al Benarroch, JCFS supervisor of clinical services. "He got us talking about how to market our services. He suggested that we should be getting out into the community more as compared to waiting for people to come to us."

"He [Rabbi Olitzky] told us that we should be treating everyone who comes to our programs as if they were guests coming for dinner in our homes," said Judi Price Rosen, federation's director of Next Generation Initiatives. "He outlined a step-by-step process, from greeting people when they come in and making sure introductions are made to escorting them to the door when they leave, and following up afterward."

JCC executive director Gayle Waxman said that she was impressed with Rabbi Olitzky. "He had some very creative ideas for us," she said. "He suggested that we take our programs out of our building to non-traditional locations such as a supermarket."

Rene Boroditsky is the executive director of the Chesed Shel Emes. She attended three of Rabbi Olitzky's sessions. "He gave us some different ways of thinking about things," she said.

She cited, for example, the concept of membership dues. Rabbi Olitzky describes dues as a form of philanthropy that pays for services.

And intermarriage, she quoted Rabbi Olitzky, is a reality but also an opportunity. "'Intermarried families are not necessarily dysfunctional,' he said."

He also talked about the problem Jewish community professionals – "insiders" – have in communicating with the unaffiliated and intermarried. "The language we use can itself get in the way," she said.

Asper philanthropy said to be unaffected by Canwest woes

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Asper family's ability to fund charitable projects won't be affected by the meltdown at Canwest Global Communications, because most of the family's giving is made through foundations that are separate from the company founded by patriarch Israel Asper, a Canwest spokesperson says.

Asper, who died six years ago, established the Asper Foundation in 1983, and it's through the foundation that the family – Barbara Asper, Israel's wife, and their children David, Gail and Leonard – directs most of its giving. Over the past 25 years, the Aspers have become Winnipeg's first Jewish family in philanthropy, in both the Jewish and larger communities.

But while Canwest was the principal source of the Asper family's wealth, the company's financial woes won't have any impact on the family's philanthropic efforts, because the foundation is completely separate from Canwest, said John Douglas, Canwest Global Communications' vice-president of public affairs.

"The Asper Foundation's philanthropic abilities rest solely on the strength of its own investments," Douglas said.

The Asper Foundation funds initiatives in the areas of culture, education, community development and human rights locally, nationally and internationally. A number of initiatives are also funded by the Asper family through their control of the Canwest Global Communications Charitable Foundation, which Douglas said is also unaffected by Canwest's financial woes.

Asper Jewish Community Campus in Winnipeg

"The Canwest Global Communications Charitable Foundation is also a separate entity with its own investment income," Douglas said. "The foundation is able to meet all of our pledged financial commitments."

He added that he expects the family to also be able to fund new initiatives in the future.

Douglas wouldn't say how much money is in the fund, but Moe Levy, executive director of the Asper Foundation, said that his fund has assets of $150 million.

In the past seven years, more than $125 million has been donated to various charitable causes through these two foundations. In addition, "the Asper Foundation is working on a number of significant world-scale initiatives requiring several million dollars in up-front commitments," its website states.

The Asper family, through the foundation, is one of the largest donors to Winnipeg's Combined Jewish Appeal, but its executive director, Elaine Goldstine, would not divulge exact dollar figures regarding the foundation's contribution.

The foundation was also the lead donor behind the Asper Jewish Community Campus, the I.H. Asper School of Business at the University of Manitoba, the I.H. Asper Clinical Research Institute at Winnipeg's St. Boniface Hospital and several programs at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem and elsewhere in Israel. Indeed, there are few areas of society in Winnipeg that haven't benefited from the Asper Foundation's largesse.

It has also been the lead donor in efforts to built the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, a $310-million federal facility being built in Winnipeg with help from three levels of government, as well as other private donors. Slated to open in 2012, it was Israel Asper's brainchild, and the fundraising campaign to bring it to fruition is being led by Gail Asper, who recently received the Order of Canada.

On Oct. 6, Canwest's holding company, CMI – which directly controls Global Television, some specialty channels and the National Post – was placed under creditor protection in order to reorganize its assets and debtor arrangements.

Douglas said that although the Aspers owned only 47 per cent of Canwest's shares, they controlled multiple voting shares, which gave them control of the company. Under the restructuring plan, the family's share of the shares would be reduced to 2.3 per cent, but Douglas says, the family will be kicking in $15 million, which will leave them with about a five per cent ownership stake.

The media giant that the late Israel Asper grew from the seed of one small television station in Winnipeg in the mid-1970s had been beset with financial troubles triggered initially from the heavy debt the company incurred in acquiring a host of newspapers and half ownership of the National Post from Conrad Black and his Hollinger Inc. for $3.5 billion in 2000.

Canwest's financial difficulties have been compounded by the recession and the competition that print media in general are facing from the Internet.

In an e-mail response to a phone query, Gail Asper declined to comment for this story.

Can Hamas stop being Hamas?

In "Hamas: The unlikely peacemaker" (Nov. 14) the Globe and Mail's Patrick Martin drew attention to a survey indicating that 57 per cent of Israelis, including a surprising 53 per cent of Likud supporters, back the idea of talks with Hamas – with conditions.

The survey, conducted by Prof. Camil Fuchs of the department of statistics at Tel Aviv University, was reported the previous day, Martin noted, in Ha'aretz by Yossi Verter. While the finding about attitudes toward Hamas grabbed the headline in that paper, Verter began by explaining the main conclusion of the survey of the Israeli political mood as follows:

"Nine months after the [Israeli] elections, the left has evaporated and the right has only grown stronger, probably stronger than ever. The Labor Party and its leadership continue to sink lower and lower, but the general public is actually exhibiting intellectual flexibility and political moderation: the majority, including most of the Likud voters, support negotiations with Hamas, if it relinquishes terrorism and recognizes Israel" (emphasis added).

Verter continued: "The survey shows the impressive rising strength of the right and a serious shrinking of the centre and the left. The balance in the current Knesset stands at 65 seats for the right and 55 for the centre and the left parties, but if elections were held today, the current survey suggests that the right would garner 72 seats to 48 for the centre and left… Kadima is retaining its strength, but Labor is crashing and it is on its way to disappearing from the political scene."

The survey results are also positive for Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who leads Kadima opposition leader Tzipi Livni by a 16 per cent margin. "The overall level of satisfaction from Netanyahu continues to be positive," Verter noted, adding that "[a] great majority blames [PA President] Mahmoud Abbas for the impasse in the peace process with the Palestinians."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

While Martin didn't go into as much detail on the findings about Israeli politics, he did remark about the drain of support for Labor "and other parties of the left."

How then to explain the apparently paradoxical finding in the survey about attitudes towards Hamas? Martin quoted from Verter's Ha'aretz article: "The attitude of Israelis to Hamas, a terrorist organization that still holds Gilad Schalit, is quite pragmatic."

Martin also interviewed Mark Heller of the Tel Aviv-based Institute for National Security Studies, who placed this pragmatism in a broader historical context: "I'd say it's consistent with a long-term trend in this country… The Israeli public prefers pro-peace policies, but doesn't trust left-wing parties to carry them out."

It's within this framework that a small majority of Israelis support the view of Kadima MK and former defence minister Shaul Mofaz, who, just prior to the survey, floated the idea of negotiating with Hamas on the condition that, as Martin observed, it "renounces violence and recognizes Israel."

Martin cited Mofaz's comment that if Hamas was to meet these conditions – set down years ago by the "Quartet," consisting of the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations – "from that moment, it is no longer Hamas."

What Martin did not address, however, is the question posed by Mofaz: Can Hamas stop being Hamas? That is, can it transform itself from a terrorist organization bent on destroying Israel and become a reasonable political organization with which Israelis would have a basis for holding negotiations?

As of now, there's simply no evidence that such a transformation is possible, let alone likely. If anything, Hamas officials both in Gaza and in Syria have recently been insisting that their religiously inspired opposition to Israel and Jewish sovereignty is as implacable as ever.

Nonetheless, by drawing attention to Verter's report of the survey of the current Israeli political mindset, Martin has given Globe readers a rare insight into the complex, pragmatic, attitude that has long characterized the Jewish state's citizens.

Dion defends party

As for Ignatieff's war crimes charge, Cotler said it was "taken out of context" and he has since apologized.

Cotler also said the flyers are partisan and shouldn't have been mailed to constituents at public expense, terming it a "prima facie breach of [parliamentary] privilege."

The flyer, titled "Committed to Canada's Jewish Community," compares the Conservative and purported Liberal records on fighting anti-Semitism abroad, combating terrorism and support for Israel. It asks the question: "Who is on the right track to represent and defend the values of Canada's Jewish community?" It then lists the leaders of the four national parties.

Stéphane Dion

Toronto-area MP Joe Volpe was audibly agitated as he tore into the Tories last week, calling a flyer sent to his Eglinton-Lawrence riding "unbecoming and unproductive."

"It's pretty partisan propaganda paid by the public purse in order to gain advantage," he said in a telephone interview from Ottawa.

"It's distortions of the truth using the Jewish community as a wedge in the social fabric of… our society."

Volpe, whose riding has a substantial Jewish population, said the flyer parades falsehood as truth.

On Nov. 18, Ignatieff told reporters that the allegations made in the flyer are "outrageous" and accused the Conservatives of playing "the politics of division."

"The key point is that support for Israel should not be a partisan issue. Since 1948 there has been a consensus across party lines on support for Israel and a two-state solution… Liberal governments since 1948 have stood shoulder to shoulder with Israel… Nothing has changed, nothing will."

Montreal Liberal MP Stéphane Dion rose to defend the party's actions under his leadership during the Commons session.

"The Liberal Party never supported that funds would be sent to the Hamas-led government. What we were asking was whether the funds would reach the people in Palestine. This point of view was the point of view of the government of Israel at the time," he said.

He denounced the Conservatives for "tarnishing" not only his party's reputation, but also that of Cotler "who has dedicated his life to Israel-Canada relations."

Claiming that the Liberal government knowingly participated in an overtly anti-Semitic conference is "a serious misrepresentation of the facts, and we cannot let that stand. If we do, it means that political parties can use taxpayers' money to say whatever they want, and to stoop as low as you can imagine, and that there is no limit to the lies they can tell the unwitting public," Dion said.

Cotler's position was also defended by Bloc Québécois member Michel Guimond and Windsor, Ont.,-area MP Brian Masse of the New Democratic Party.

Government House leader Jay Hill defended the propriety of the mailings, saying the Tories aren't the only party doing it.

"My point is that all parties are participating in this type of communication and it is grossly unfair to suggest that it is only the Conservative Party that is doing so," he said.

Speaker Peter Milliken said he would look into whether there has been a breach of privilege and report back to the House on the matter.

One of the recipients of the flyer, Alan L. Simons, who lives in the Toronto riding of St. Paul's, wrote to The CJN: "As a Jew, I find its content offensive, especially when [John] Duncan [the Vancouver Conservative MP who sent it to him] implies that I need the Conservative Party to represent and defend my values as a Jew.

"I am appalled by this form of politicizing. In addition, I doubt very much if there are many Jewish people living in my neighbourhood. Therefore, I believe this form of literature will most certainly backfire. And in doing so. I am sure Duncan has helped the anti-Semites use yet another means of promoting their hatred."

Calgary has largest student delegation at GA

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Praries Correspondent

The small Jewish community of Calgary sent 10 students to the General Assembly of the Jewish Federation of North America in Washington, D.C., earlier this month – by far the largest student delegation per capita in all of Jewish North America.

About 150 of the 3,000 delegates at the GA were students. In comparison with Calgary, Toronto sent two students, Montreal sent one and other Canadian cities didn't send any.

Jerry Silverman, the new CEO and president of the North American federation umbrella group, said he hopes to have 1,000 students attend next year's event.

Dede Feinberg, a GA co-chair, noted that the event had fewer students than usual because fewer subsidies were available due to the tough economic climate.

In an interview with The CJN, Lance Davis, executive director of the Calgary Jewish Community Council (CJCC), said his community is "very fortunate that we have a donor [Ted Riback] who endowed a fund for young leadership and we were able to use $3,000 from that fund to subsidize students from Hillel to attend the conference.

"All it took was subsidizing each student $300 to get 10 of them interested in coming to the GA and paying the rest of the way themselves. The GA registration fee was only $150 per student."

CJCC president Gerry Barron told The CJN that "if all it takes is to subsidize $300 per student to get them motivated, inspired and involved, that it's the best $300 we could ever have spent."

Barron added that Jewish leaders are excited about student participation and think that it's "important for our community to have the students exposed to the GA. They're telling us that they are glad they made the decision to come."

Adam Zendel, a student native to Calgary, said he decided to attend "because I was interested in seeing the [United States] Holocaust Memorial Museum, and because I read that the [U.S. President Barak Obama] was going to speak at the GA, and it looked like a good program."

Although Obama had to back out of his speaking engagement at the GA at the last minute, White House Chief of Staff Rahm Emanuel addressed the gathering in his place.

Other students, some of whom are grandchildren of Holocaust survivors, also said that Washington's Holocaust museum, combined with the list of speakers at the GA, motivated them to participate.

Muriel Fogel, a nursing student, said that she came to the GA "because I love Washington and I wanted to learn more about Israel, and hear the speakers."

Another student, Julia Tzam, said she really came to hear Obama speak, but "I'm fine with him sending Rahm Emanuel instead, since [Obama] had to go to Fort Hood" and attend the memorial for soldiers killed in the mass shooting at the Texas army base.

Tzam, who founded a Palestinian-Israeli Dialogue Club a number of years ago at the University of Calgary that is no longer operating, was interested in hearing speakers at the GA discuss current political events.

From left, Muriel Fogel, and Adam Zendel, both students who grew up in Calgary, take some time during the General Assembly of Jewish Federation to socialize with their peers.

Nachum Abraham, a Calgary student who is also Israeli, said, "I want to understand the issues facing Israel and thought the GA would be a good place to learn about this."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

How we can win the (public relations) war

By NAOMI HAWORTH

Guest Voice

Unifying the global Jewish community and creating new and positive images of Israeli life and culture was the key message at the recent Do the Write Thing conference.

One of the goals of the conference was to inspire young Jewish journalists to be leaders in creating new and unique ways of carrying this message to campuses.

The conference, which took place from Nov. 8 to 10, was hosted by the World Zionist Organization's Hagshama department as a part of the Jewish Federations of North America's General Assembly in Washington, D.C. Do the Write Thing brought a plethora of speakers and experiences to participants who wish to change the direction of Israel advocacy on campuses.

As a corporate communications student at Seneca College in Toronto, I was interested in attending this conference to learn what messages are needed to influence the media to give Israel positive coverage – especially new and emerging media – and to win the public relation war on Canadian campuses. I wanted to know how Canadian Jewish communities, Canadian Jewish students and our fellow Canadians came to a point where we are consistently bombarded with false, anti-Israel information. I found the answer abundantly clear: we've lost the war, that is, the public relations war.

What I learned at this three-day conference is that we as a community need to do more if we ever want to win the war.

We must pressure Israeli leadership to make stronger connections with North American and European journalists in order to promote positive stories about Israel that are unrelated to the Palestinian conflict

We must unify our message in order to make our goals and objectives clear to both global Jewish communities and the world.

We must take back the word Zionism and empower young Jewish leaders to be Zionists.

Messaging from Israel has focused mainly on defensive tactics, and advocacy groups continue to create talking points based on counter arguments rather than creating arguments. Our inability to promote Israel as anything other than war-torn, dangerous, and uninhabitable has allowed images and reports in western media to depict Israel simply as tanks and soldiers in Gaza or damage and debris in Sderot.

Natan Sharansky, chairman of the executive of the Jewish Agency for Israel, told conference participants that Jewish identity is the biggest challenge facing the global Jewish community and that it is Israel's responsibility to create stronger connections between Israel and the Diaspora. "Israel is a legitimate state and has the right to exist" is a good way to start the conversation, he said.

Empowering young Jewish leaders is the key to creating a successful pro-Israel campaign worldwide. If we want to change public opinion on Israel, we must unite in educating our youth on the importance of Israel and our Zionist heritage, and demand that our leadership highlights the uniqueness of the Israeli people and its culture.

Time is running out, and if we don't act soon, Israel's international reputation will forever be damaged.

Naomi Haworth is a student at Seneca College in Toronto.

No long waits at Jerusalem hospital

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As director of international affairs of Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Medical Center, Uri Schwarz is fully briefed about all the wonderful things the hospital does for the residents of the Israeli capital. But one fact he cited during a recent visit to Toronto stood out: even though the facility's emergency department has seen its caseload surge to 90,000 per year – 247 a day, far more than any other hospital in the city – the average time to see a doctor is 1-1/2 hours.

Can that be right? One and a half hours? In that length of time in a Toronto emergency department, you might not even have removed your coat before settling in for a lengthy stay.

Shaare Zedek, which is located in Jerusalem's western neighbourhoods, has seen its wait time shrink, thanks to innovations brought to the hospital by the late Dr. David Applebaum, an American who was killed in a terrorist attack in 2003 on the eve of his daughter's wedding.

"He brought emergency techniques to the hospital as a subspecialty," Schwarz said. Though the 90-minute wait might be the envy of any Toronto hospital, "our hope is to do better than that," he said. "We're not there yet."

With the growth in recent years of emergency room use, pressure on the hospital's operating rooms has also ratcheted up. Which brings us to one of the reasons for Schwarz's visit. The 540-bed Shaare Zedek is in the middle of a 155-million shekel ($43.5 million US) fundraising campaign for two capital projects: expanding its operating theatres and constructing a new pediatric medicine wing.

The current facility was erected in the late 1970s, when the emergency department saw between 15,000 and 20,000 patients a year. "The emergency department is a main supplier to the operating rooms," Schwarz said. "The numbers speak for themselves."

One reason the hospital's emerg is so busy is that "people know our emergency room is the most efficient in the city and it's easier to get to" than other hospitals, he said.

During the height of the second intifadah, from 2000 to 2004, there were 26 major suicide attacks in the Jerusalem area and "we received 40 per cent of the victims," Schwarz said. "That has given us quite some experience in treating terrorism victims, and we have shared that expertise with hospitals around the world."

Seven of the proposed 13 new operating theatres are expected to be completed by May 2010.

The other proposed expansion is creation of a stand-alone pediatric hospital. Shaare Zedek currently has a pediatric emergency department, but the plans call for a new two-storey facility constructed on site.

"There is a great need for a pediatric hospital as we have close to 13,000 deliveries each year, half of all Jerusalem," he said. "We are extremely crowded."

Currently, 92 per cent of the hospital's maternity patients are Jewish and eight per cent Arab. There are plenty of Arab hospitals able to deliver babies, he said, but the ones that end up at Shaare Zedek are largely high-risk cases. Seventy-five per cent of pediatric dialysis cases involve Arab children.

"That has to do with the intermarriage within the Arab world, cousins marrying cousins. That creates kidney problems." The majority of the Jewish children receiving pediatric dialysis come from haredi families, which experiences similar marriage patterns, he said.

The hospital reflects the city's demography and is open to people of all backgrounds, Schwarz continued. "We live in a multicultural city. When it comes to medicine, the doctors here treat everybody. We try to live up to the hospital's [Hebrew] name, the Gates of Righteousness."

Some of the time, that can be difficult for staff. "It's not always easy for a midwife who was stoned at Gush Etzion (a West Bank settlement) to deliver an Arab child, but politics stops at the gate."

The hospital's Arab staff likewise will treat all patients. Schwarz referred to one case in which a Palestinian thoracic specialist saved the life of a terror victim, who had been shot on Jaffa Street and "was as dead as you can be and still be alive."

"This is Jerusalem. This is the reality we live with," he said.

The Shaare Zedek has had a Toronto support group for years, said Jonathan Allen, national executive director of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation. Though not particularly large, the group raises on average $1.5 to $2 million per year, which is dedicated to medical equipment, professional development, nursing scholarships and medical research.

Senior tour to Israel an 'eye-opener'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Although Carl and Edith Newton have been to Israel eight or nine times, a recent tour geared for active seniors really opened their eyes.

The Newtons, 82 and 80 respectively, along with 25 other participants – 23 were seniors – took part in the recent Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University and Beit Halochem Canada mission, which took them across the country.

Along the tour they visited two Israel Defence Force bases, Beit Halochem's facilities in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, and Bar-Ilan University. They also visited the Knesset, received a briefing from MK Nachman Shai and watched proceedings from the visitor's gallery.

Edith Newton said that one of their "biggest eye-openers" was their stop at Bar-Ilan.

"First of all, we were impressed with the campus. The architecture is unreal. What really impressed us though is the work that goes on there."

They met with representatives from several departments, she said, and enjoyed a performance by music students. "The school serves Israeli and Arab students, and a number of Arab students were performing.

"We also learned about the legal aid department led by disabled women, and about the Alzheimer's research going on. It was unbelievable to us to see everything happening there."

Newton said that although she had never before supported the school, she will now. "They are doing work that no one in the world is doing. I believe that any cures found [for Alzheimer's] will be found in Israel."

Bertha Weisz, 82, who travelled with her husband Isidor, said they were hesitant, at first, about joining the tour, "but it turned out great. Dov Altman [executive vice-president and CEO of Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University] took care of us like we were his parents. He made sure everyone was up and out and where they were supposed to be."

She praised the work of both the university and Beit Halochem. "We had never seen this part of Israel. It was amazing to see their work. Both organizations are unbelievable."

And now for something completely different: HEEBONICS

Teacher/unsung community hero helps at-risk students develop leadership skills

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to The CJN

Amanda Fingerhut became a teacher because she wanted to help kids, not because she wanted to win awards. But now the 31-year-old math teacher at Toronto's Earl Haig Secondary School has done both things.

In October, Fingerhut was given the 2009 Canadian Living Me to We award for her work with the Herbert H. Carnegie Future Aces Foundation.

Each year the award is given to five unsung community heroes by Canadian Living magazine and Me to We, a "social enterprise" that helps fund its non-profit sister-organization, Free the Children, through money-making activities such as book publishing, a speakers bureau, and volunteer-oriented tourism.

"We're generally looking for somebody who is not brand new to the idea of creating change, but who doesn't run an organization with a budget of $20 million. Someone who is making a big impact well beyond the call of duty," said Me to We executive director Russ McLeod.

"The awards are a launching pad for these people to continue to expand and grow their organizations."

Along with the education award given to Fingerhut, honours are also given in two youth categories, social action, and community. Each award is accompanied by a $5,000 prize, which Fingerhut donated to Future Aces, a non-profit organization that works to help people be "responsible, respectful, peaceful, confident and caring citizens."

Vivian Shapiro, left, the Future Aces executive director, introduced Fingerhut to the organization and inspired her to work with at-risk kids.

For Fingerhut, the award was flattering, but not wholly unexpected.

"I knew I'd been nominated," she said. "They chose three people nationally from all of the applications, and in May, there was a vote on the Internet."

But Fingerhut is more eager to talk about the work that won her the award than about herself.

Amanda Fingerhut, the recipient of the 2009 Canadian Living Me to We award, said she's motivated to help youth give back to society and reach their highest potential.

After high school at Forest Hill Collegiate, Fingerhut attended McGill University before graduating with a degree in education from York University. But it was when she discovered the Future Aces Foundation that Fingerhut knew she had found her calling.

"I always worked with youth and I became a teacher because I wanted to help youth gain leadership skills, but with Future Aces I saw that I can help kids who aren't there yet," she said.

Founded in 1987 by Herbert H. Carnegie, Future Aces helps build self-esteem and encourages ethical behaviour in young people. Its projects include motivational workshops and conferences for both teachers and students.

"Future Aces basically empowers you to turn around kids' lives and help them move in positive directions, to give back to society, to help make them the best they can be," Fingerhut said.

"They're potential leaders, but they're not leaders yet," she added. "Maybe they're a little shy, but there's something in them, and these kids usually wind up running their schools later."

Carnegie, an African-Canadian hockey player whose once-promising career had been stunted by racism, started Future Aces to give young people leadership skills.

"He turned around and instead of being bitter he decided that if I can have a positive attitude, if I can be confident I will be OK, and he started teaching kids both about hockey and life," Fingerhut said.

Fingerhut discovered Future Aces when she met Vivian Shapiro, the organization's education director, at a rehearsal for the Toronto District School Board Cabaret Singers.

"She told me about Future Aces and what it did, and I thought, 'Wow, this is what I want to do,'" Fingerhut said.

"This is why I wanted to become a teacher, but I wasn't working with the at-risk kids and I thought, there's more I can do here."

In university, Fingerhut had run conferences for an organization called Taking Action on Impaired Driving. She took those skills and applied them to start the Future Aces Leadership Conference.

Now in its sixth year, the conference takes about 200 at-risk students and their teachers from 26 Toronto-area schools for a weekend of leadership training seminars. The conference features motivational speakers as well as workshops in event planning, public speaking and community service.

"She saw a need to empower students who are lacking self-esteem and motivation and she's done this incredible conference," said McLeod.

"I think it was that engagement and her incredible dedication that made her a fantastic and special candidate for the award."

Attitude
Ability
Action

At the conference, students choose a community service project that they bring back to their schools. Projects can focus on issues such as sober driving, homelessness, the environment, and can include efforts such as food and clothing drives.

"The biggest thing about the whole conference is that these kids who never considered themselves leaders get told that they've been chosen because their teachers think they're leaders," Fingerhut said.

"It's possible that nobody believed in them before, and they see these speakers who were maybe in the same situation, and they think, 'Wow, I can do this.' And they want to give back because they hear from speakers who have given back."

While the leadership conference is an important part of Fingerhut's work, she also works year-round with high school students and teachers.

"Teachers are given nomination forms, and they can choose a student in their class who deserves a 'subject' award, kids who improved, or helped somebody else," she said.

"It can encourage kids who aren't always feeling good about themselves. There are some really tough schools where kids will walk down the hall and get congratulations from their peers for getting these awards."

In some cases, that encouragement can have drastic effects. In one instance, Fingerhut recalled, a student was about to be initiated into a gang before getting involved with Future Aces.

"There are kids who have said that they would be dead without us," she said. "One kid was being initiated into a gang, but wound up going to college. Later, he bumped into a peer in the hospital who had been hurt in a gunfight."

Thanks to a government grant, Fingerhut is currently able to work part time with Future Aces while she continues to teach.

But for her, helping kids isn't just a job: it's a calling.

Fatah officials warn of third Palestinian intifadah

By JACK KHOURY
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Fatah has made a strategic decision to declare a third intifadah against Israel, movement officials told Nazareth-based newspaper Hadith Anas last week, citing the failed peace talks as the reason for its resolution.

The newspaper report quoted Fatah Central Committee members as saying that the movement wished to implement a decision made during its sixth convention, which assembled last August in the West Bank city of Bethlehem.

One of the movement's top officials interviewed by Hadith Anas said the third intifadah will have a widespread popular base, adding, however, that unlike the previous popular struggle against Israel, which was sparked in September 2000, the movement will not endorse an armed struggle or the use of firearms.

"We want thousands of Palestinians to demonstrate daily near the settlements of the occupation, carrying out a human siege, and calling for the end of the occupation," one senior official said.

According to the report, Fatah head and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas agreed to the resolution in principle, stipulating only that the struggle mustn't become a violent one.

Fatah officials have commented recently on the need to duplicate the weekly anti-separation fence rallies in the villages of Na'alin and Bil'in in locations across the West Bank, as well as turning some of those demonstrations against nearby settlements.

A senior member of an Arab-Israeli Knesset party, who maintains close ties with top Fatah and PA officials, said that anti-separation fence rallies could spark renewed popular resistance if they continued to escalate as they did recently near the Kalandia checkpoint.

The official said that PA sources have come to understand that unarmed popular resistance, centring on symbols of the West Bank occupation, could garner sympathy for the Palestinian cause in international circles as well as embarrassing the Israeli government.

"The first intifadah gained significant diplomatic ground as far as the Palestinians are concerned since its symbol, a boy throwing rocks at a tank, made it impossible for Israel to claim it was defending itself against terror as it did in the second intifadah, following the city-centre bombings," the official said.

IDF vows zero tolerance for soldiers who refuse orders

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Gabi Ashkenazi said on Sunday that the army has a zero tolerance policy for soldiers who refuse orders during their service.

"We have no tolerance for this type of insubordination, no matter which side of the political spectrum the soldiers are on," Ashkenazi declared at a welcoming ceremony for new recruits in the elite Golani Brigade.

The IDF chief made his comments as a result of a recent spate of events involving combat soldiers from various units within the Kfir Brigade who announced that they would not evacuate unauthorized West Bank outposts.

"It is possible that during your service the army will need you for several of our missions, and those who will make the difference are the soldiers on the front line," added the IDF chief.

Defence Minister Ehud Barak on Saturday reiterated his own pledge to crack down on IDF soldiers who refuse to carry out orders, saying Israel should not hesitate to act forcefully to crush the phenomenon.

"A country that wishes to live must put an end to refusal by the right and left with an iron fist," said Barak in a closed meeting.

According to a statement his bureau released, the defence minister is expected to hold a number of meetings in the coming days with law enforcement and intelligence officials. During the talks, he will decide on how to treat those who incite and encourage refusal among soldiers, the statement said.

Barak's comments echoed remarks by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who warned last week that such refusal would contribute to the collapse of the State of Israel.

Earlier this week, six soldiers from the Kfir Brigade's Nachshon Battalion hung a sign at their West Bank base proclaiming that their unit would refuse to evacuate settlements.

Their protest followed the demolition of two illegal houses near the Negohot settlement south of Hebron.

Two of the soldiers were sentenced to 30 days in military prison, dismissed from their unit and demoted as a result of the protest. A military court ruled that another soldier was to spend 20 days in jail, and a fourth was sentenced to 14 days. The other two soldiers are to remain confined to their base for 28 days.

Last month, soldiers from the Shimshon Battalion held banners with the same message during their graduation ceremony in Jerusalem. Two soldiers were expelled from their brigade and given 20 days in military prison.

The Shimshon and Nachshon battalions are both part of the Kfir Brigade, set up to battle Palestinian guerrillas in the West Bank. Such duties have diminished amid a law-and-order drive by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' U.S.-backed administration, which wants to project power in the face of the rival Hamas Islamists now ruling Gaza.

Kfir has been under military investigation for several high-profile cases in which Palestinian civilians complained of abuse by the brigade. Its former commander was reprimanded for sanctioning use of force during questioning of suspect.

In related developments, the number of new recruits in the IDF seeking to serve in combat units has jumped by six per cent, the army said on Sunday as it began to induct the large November draft.

According to IDF data, 73.7 per cent of all the recruits with the necessary level of fitness requested to serve in combat units. At the same time last year, only 67.2 per cent of the conscripts asked to do so.

As in previous years, the IDF infantry brigades are the most highly sought after by those who wish to serve in combat. The Golani Brigade was the most popular with the current draft, as it was also last November, with seven recruits competing for every place in the veteran unit.

But there was also a significant rise in the number of recruits seeking to serve in the Armored Corps, the Artillery Corps, Field Intelligence and the Israel Air Force's anti-aircraft division.

The IDF explains the rise in motivation to serve in combat units as stemming from Israel's winter offensive against Hamas in Gaza, code-named Operation Cast Lead.

Canada, Israel to negotiate telecommunications pact

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There were plenty of discussions during Industry Minister Tony Clement's visit to Israel last week, but one meeting actually led to an agreement – for more talks.

In a telephone news conference with reporters, Clement announced an agreement "to open up discussions on the mutual recognition of telecommunications protocols."

Clement said he met with Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, Israel's ministry of industry, trade and labour, and the two agreed to begin negotiations on a Mutual Recognition Agreement (MRA). The agreement, once it's completed, will "mutually recognize telecom protocols and assist business that seeks to work in both jurisdictions. An MRA will broaden trade opportunities for Canada's telecommunications industry and provide access to Israel's latest communications technology for Canadian industry and consumers," he said.

Clement's announcement came during a five-day visit to Israel designed to improve trade relations. The minister met with Israeli industry and government officials to discuss a number of sectors, including communications technology, biotechnology, aerospace and defence.

MRAs "facilitate trade by streamlining the conformity assessment procedures for a wide range of telecommunications equipment," Industry Canada stated in a news release. "An MRA would allow Canada and Israel to accept each other's test results and, eventually, certificates of compliance."

Negotiations on the MRA will commence early in 2010 in Israel.

Clement said his trip to Israel was meant to explore opportunities "to deepen our economic and commercial relationship." He met with executives of senior Israeli enterprises, including Israel Aircraft Industries, and he addressed a conference on water technologies.

In his speech to the Water Technologies, Renewable Energy and Environmental Control Exhibition and Conference, Clement said Canada is open to new business opportunities with Israel.

"This year marks the 60th anniversary of relations between Israel and Canada. Twelve years ago, we cemented the bonds of friendship with the ties of commerce through the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement. And I know that for all the success stories under that agreement so far, there are many more waiting to be written."

Clement said water management is likely to be "a defining global issue that will touch every nation and affect every industry, requiring all of us to replace old habits with new approaches."

While Canada is blessed with an abundant water supply, 60 per cent of it flows north and is not easily accessible to the population centres to the south. As a result, Canadian corporations and academics have become leaders in water technology and the federal government has invested billions in water technology infrastructure and research, he said.

Israel, he pointed out, "is a land with many riches but not water." Israel is heavily involved in desalinization programs and in reducing its carbon footprint while cleaning water and using less energy. Clement suggested a possible future collaboration on developing clean energy sources and in exchanging information on water management.

Clement's itinerary included a trip to Jerusalem, where he visited the Yissum Research Development Company, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's technology transfer company. In Haifa, he toured the Intel Development Design Center, one of the company's largest research and design facilities.

Main battlefield on campuses: Sharansky

The main battlefield for Jewish identity is usually university campuses, Sharansky said.

"[There's] the idea that you're now becoming part of the big world," he said, adding that it's harder for students without strong Jewish backgrounds to feel connected to Israel. "A lot of [people] are against Israel."

Sharansky paraphrased a lyric from the song Imagine by John Lennon: "There is nothing to die for," he said. "It is very important to prove that this is a false idea. In a world where there is nothing to die for, there is nothing to live for."

In the late 1970s, Sharansky, who was born in the former Soviet Union, was sent to jail and convicted of treason and espionage while fighting for human rights.

As he embarks on a different fight for Jewish identity, Sharansky uses the same logic now as he did then.

"[Opinions] can be changed very quickly. The more you can succeed in bringing [students] the real [facts] of human rights, the rights of women, sexual minorities [in Israel], they are happy to hear it," he said.

For Sharansky, identity is synonymous with freedom.

"Jewish influence is weakening… If you believe that it's better to live in the world where people have no identity… we're powerless to defend ourselves against our enemies," he said.

Reports about Schalit deal said 'misleading'

JTA

JERUSALEM — Reports about a deal to secure the release of a captured Israeli soldier are misleading, the Israeli Prime Minister's Office said.

Reports circulated over the weekend that a deal to release Gilad Schalit was imminent.

"Many details coming from abroad and in foreign media are being published lately, but they are not credible and some of them are even intentionally distorted," the Prime Minister's Office said Monday in a statement.

"Efforts to secure Gilad Schalit's release are continuously underway, out of the media's view, and we have no intentions of commenting beyond that."

Schalit's family met Monday in Tel Aviv with the prime minister's special negotiator.

"Now is not the time to talk," Schalit's father, Noam, said prior to the meeting. Following the meeting he said, "I am still not reassured."

Also Monday, a newspaper affiliated with Hamas reported that the deal hinges on one prisoner whose release is still being negotiated by the two sides. The report comes on the heels of a report Sunday by Fox News that said Israel has approved a final list of 70 prisoners to be exchanged as part of the 450 prisoners named by Hamas in exchange for Schalit.

Hamas has said it plans to hold the prisoner exchange on Friday, the day of a Muslim feast.

Israeli President Shimon Peres said Sunday following a meeting in Cairo with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak that "real progress" has been made in negotiations to release Schalit.

Israel Briefs

Israel responds to Qassams

Israeli air strikes hit targets in Gaza in response to a Qassam rocket fired into the Negev. Two smuggling tunnels and a weapons factory in southern Gaza were hit in the air force raid last week, according to the Israel Defence Forces. About 15 rockets and mortar shells have been fired from Gaza at Israel in the past month, the IDF said. No damage or injury was reported from the Qassam. In addition last week, an explosive device was detonated against Israeli forces patrolling the border with the central Gaza Strip. More than 250 rockets and mortar shells have been fired at Israel since the end of Operation Cast Lead in January; more than 750 have hit Israel in 2009.

Woman arrested at Kotel

Jerusalem police arrested a woman praying at the Western Wall for wearing a tallit. The woman, who was participating in Rosh Chodesh services, was arrested last Wednesday based on an Israeli Supreme Court ruling that the public must dress according to the customs of the site, Israel Radio reported. Police came to the site after the Women of the Wall group asked to read from a Torah scroll, according to reports. The group usually holds its services at Robinson's Arch, located near the Wall. Rabbi Shmuel Rabinovitch, the Western Wall rabbi, called the group's actions "an act of provocation that seeks to turn the Western Wall into disputed territory," according to reports. The chair of the women's group, Anat Hoffman, said it was the first time that a woman has been arrested at the Western Wall for donning a tallit. She identified the arrested woman as Nofrat Frenkel, a medical student from Be'er Sheva.

Noam most popular Israeli name

Noam was the most popular name for Israeli babies born in 2008. The name was given to 1,970 boys and 515 girls, according to Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics, which released the data in advance of Universal Children's Day on Friday. For Jewish Israeli boys, the other most popular names were Itai, Ori, Daniel, Yehonatan, David, Ido, Moshe, Yosef and Yonatan. For Jewish Israeli girls, the names topping the list were Noa, Shira, Yael, Tamar, Maya, Talia, Sara, Hila, Michal and Adi. One-quarter of Muslim Israeli boys born in Israel in 2008 were given names derived from the name of the prophet Muhammad, including Muhammad, Ahmed and Mahmoud. Some 156,900 babies were born in Israel that year.

Italy, Israel ink agriculture deal

Italy and Israel have agreed to strengthen co-operation in agricultural science and technology. Italy's Agriculture Minister Luca Zaia and Shalom Simhon, Israel's minister of agriculture and rural development, signed a joint declaration last week that will lead to a formal accord between the two countries. The accord will mandate bilateral research and development programs, as well as an operational program in agrarian science. Simhon was in Rome attending the summit of the UN Food and Agriculture Organization. No date was announced for signing the formal accord.

Recognizing Palestinian state

The European Union said it was "premature" to recognize a Palestinian state. "I don't think we are there yet," Sweden's Foreign Minister Carl Bildt said last week, according to reports. "I would hope we would be in a position to recognize a Palestinian state, but there has to be one first. So I think that is a bit premature. We would be ready to recognize a Palestinian state, but conditions are not there as of yet." Sweden currently holds the rotating presidency of the EU. France and Britain, which are EU members, are permanent members of the Security Council and have veto power. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said that a unilateral declaration of a state by the Palestinian Authority could lead to unilateral actions by Israel, including annexing settlements.

Israel joins NATO anti-terror force

Israel will send a warship to join a NATO anti-terror force, bolstering its ties with the alliance. An Israeli missile ship will join NATO's Active Endeavor naval force in the Middle East within the next few months, according to media reports. The force works to prevent the passage of terrorists and weapons of mass destruction, in addition to protecting the security of the shipping industry in the region. Israel already had a liaison officer with the force, but defence officials say having a ship as part of the force is a major step forward in the Jewish state's relations with NATO. Israel is not a member of NATO, but other non-NATO countries, such as Russia and Ukraine, are part of the force. Plans are for an Israeli ship to occasionally join one of the force's monthlong operations, and that the force would try to avoid Israeli ships approaching the shore lines of Arab countries with which it does not have diplomatic relations.

Crime, plus politics, propelling Jews out of Venezuela

By JASMINA KELEMEN
JTA

CARACAS, Venezuela — Esther Benchimol de Roffe arrived in Venezuela as a young bride, leaving northern Morocco more than 50 years ago to meet her groom in a prosperous foreign land.

The young couple fit in easily in a country where, as Spanish-speaking Sephardim, they already were familiar with the language, and the Jewish community was established. Her husband built a successful business, and Benchimol raised a family and earned international renown singing the ancient Sephardic hymns she had learned as a child in Alcazarquivir.

"It was a rich country, there were a lot of opportunities," reminisces Benchimol, now 74. "We had many friends and there was a real sense of brotherhood. There was never any racism against us."

Her tone changes, however, when she considers the futures of her grandchildren and whether she would advise them to stay in Venezuela.

"I wouldn't stay here," Benchimol said. "I'm speaking as a grandmother."

Hugo Chávez

It's not anti-Semitism that causes her to fear daily for the safety of her grandchildren but "la inseguridad" – insecurity. It's the general term Venezuelans use now to describe an unrelenting crime wave that cuts across the country's economically and ideologically polarized society. The issue consistently tops surveys here as Venezuelans' biggest concern.

Venezuelan Jews say that as citizens of a state in which many have lost faith in the police and judicial system, they fear random violence far more than anti-Semitic attacks. They consistently cite crime as their main source of anxiety.

Last year, Foreign Policy magazine called Caracas the murder capital of the world, tallying the homicide rate at 130 per 100,000 residents. Official statistics are hard to come by because the government has stopped providing details.

In order to gauge crime, journalists rely on the city morgue in Caracas to report how many bodies arrived over the weekend as the result of violence, publishing their tally in newspapers on Monday mornings. In one wave of weekend violence in early October, 56 people were reported murdered in this city of just over four million people.

In addition to murder, kidnappings for ransom – a source of high anxiety for the city's wealthier inhabitants – are said to be on the rise. Jews say they feel at particular risk due to the perception that the Jewish community can pony up a large ransom for a kidnapped Jew.

Yair Rosemberg, a 28-year old theatre producer, is less than a month away from getting married. Where crime was once regarded as something he read about in the papers, now it has touched a growing number of his acquaintances, he said. He and his fiancee probably will move to Israel after they are married; the couple recently returned from a trip there to explore their options. Rosemberg cited it as his main reason for wanting to leave.

That fear, combined with President Hugo Chavez's verbal broadsides against Israel and still fresh memories of a shocking assault last January against the community's main synagogue, Tiferet Israel, is prompting many Jews here to consider whether there is a future for them in Venezuela. Over the past decade, the Jewish community has fallen from a high of about 20,000 members to the oft-cited figures of 13,000 to 10,000, according to local Jewish activists.

Throughout his decade in power, Chavez has referred to the United States as imperialist and belligerent. Following Israel's incursion into Gaza last winter, Chavez severed diplomatic ties with Israel and ratcheted up his rhetoric against the Jewish state. He refers to Israel as a genocidal state. Once he referred disparagingly to Colombia as the region's "Israel" while voicing his displeasure at an agreement to allow the U.S. military access to Colombia's military bases.

Meanwhile, he's built friendships with and welcomed the presidents of Iran and Libya, part of what he has described as his efforts to build a counterweight to U.S. "hegemony."

Venezuelan Jews say there is a wide gap between the president's anti-Israel rhetoric and the attitudes of the Venezuelan people toward Jews. Venezuela has not seen the anti-Semitism that exists in some other Latin American countries.

"I would rather be a Jew here than in Spain," said Paulina Gamus, a local political commentator and outspoken critic of Chavez, responding to a question about whether Venezuela is still safe for Jews.

"There, anti-Semitism is among the people. Here, with all of the government's hostility, the people aren't hostile. There isn't a personal sense of anti-Semitism."

Gamus is the only Jew to have served in Venezuela's National Assembly.

While Gamus insists that her home is in Venezuela, the younger generation of her family has mostly left the country. All of her children, nieces and nephews live abroad to escape the security situation, she said.

While not explicitly anti-Semitic, local Jews fear Chavez's constant barrage of anti-Israeli discourse could breed hostility towards their community, adding another layer of stress in a city where many citizens already feel helpless coping with one of the highest murder rates in the world.

"There's a lot of fear that there could be an attack against the community," said Camila Roffe de Levy, a 51-year old biologist in Caracas and Benchimol's daughter.

"No one has attacked us," she explained. "It's not the people, nor your neighbor nor the guy who lives down the street from you. But what scares us is this anti-Israeli discourse that could be wrongly interpreted by people who don't know any better."

Singing duo makes obscure Sephardi tunes accessible

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Judith Cohen and her daughter, Tamar Ilana Cohen Adams, are gearing up to perform a collection of Sephardi songs from Spain and Portugal, but don't expect to hear any mainstream Sephardi tunes.

"It's not a standard performance format. We talk to the audience, we kid around a lot, we'll give them a choice of songs, but we don't do any big hits," said Cohen, a singer and ethnomusicologist, well-known for her renditions of the oldest Sephardi songs, and songs from French Canada, the Balkans and Medieval Europe.

"We won't do like a Top 10 of Sephardic hits... We do songs that people mostly don't know, but what we do is give them more of a feeling of involvement."

On Dec. 5, Cohen and her daughter will perform at the Casa do Alentejo Community Centre in Toronto.

"We always wanted to do a Judith and Tamar and friends concert because we have a lot of musical friends and there are a lot of groups my mother has been a part of and groups that I'm a part of, and we thought we'd put it all together and do a collaboration between her music world and my music world," said Cohen Adams, 23, who balances a career working with the Green Energy Act Alliance and performing with Brazilian and flamenco groups.

Cohen, who teaches part time at York University, has been performing and studying music for about three decades.

Her master's thesis focused on women musicians in the Christian, Muslim and Jewish communities of medieval Iberia and her doctoral dissertation examined Judeo-Spanish music, or Ladino, in Toronto and Montreal.

Throughout the years, her research led her to travel extensively throughout the Mediterranean, and along the Portugal-Spain border, with her daughter in tow.

She said her fieldwork in musicology, which she described as the "anthropology of music," meant she spent a lot of time observing traditions of people living in small villages and interviewing them.

"[My daughter] has been doing that with me since she was born. She's been taken out of school, she's fluent in Spanish, Portuguese, French. She acted as my fieldwork assistant many times. She's brought her homework with her and did it in little villages in Spain or Portugal or Turkey or Israel."

Having been exposed to Sephardi culture, languages and music since she was a baby, it wasn't long before Cohen Adams began to share the stage with her mother, too.

"How long have I been dragging her around and keeping her on stage with me if I didn't have a babysitter? Since she was born. How long has she actually been singing on stage? Since she was five," Cohen said, adding that they perform more concerts in Spain than in Canada, and within the last few years, they've also performed in Prague, Sarajevo, Rome and Croatia.

Cohen Adams said sharing a stage with her mother feels "normal" because she grew up doing it, but added that her involvement in the flamenco scene has little to do with her mother's influence.

"I've studied dance since I was eight or nine and I've lived in Spain and travelled to Spain a lot with my mother over the past 15 years, but it's really by coincidence that my mother's focus was on Spain and that I started flamenco dancing," Cohen Adams said.

"It's really unrelated. It was only later in my life that I started studying flamenco in Spain, and since then I've been performing for about three years now."

Cohen Adams performs with the Esmeralda Enrique Spanish Dance Company, a flamenco group based in Toronto, as well as the Jorge Miguel Flamenco Ensemble. Some of the members from these groups will be performing with them at the concert next month.

Cohen said she is also excited about performing with Geoffrey Clarfield, the executive director of the Jewish humanitarian organization, Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

"He plays the oud [an arabic string instrument] and percussion with us all the time whenever he can – he'll be there."

Cohen said that even though most audience members will be exposed to the songs they perform for the first time, the musicians try to make the experience interactive and educational.

"We talk to them and say, 'We have a song about this and a song about that, what do you want more? Or you can have a song with this instrument or that instrument, what do you want more?' We have a huge repertoire so it's not exactly a problem to think of what songs to sing, so what we do is give them a few possibilities. We do really traditional stuff, but we do it in a way that makes it easy for people to get involved," Cohen said.

"My mom and I explain as we go along usually," Cohen Adams added.

"We explain what we're doing, what country it's from, maybe where we got the song from... People love it."

Cohen said being able to perform with her daughter is "very exciting. It's probably the most rewarding thing in my life besides actually having her."

Moscow Jewish choir to make Canadian debut

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Alexander Tsaliuk was 18 years old when he first saw a box of old Jewish sheet music in Moscow's Leninskaya Library. When he opened the book, it was the first time anyone had seen the contents since 1917.

"[People in the Soviet Union] got special permission from [former Russian president Mikhail] Gorbachev to re-establish Jewish life and permission to come and open archives from the KGB," said Tsaliuk, the director and conductor of the Moscow Male Jewish Cappella. "I was there. I came to the Lenin Library in the middle of Moscow. They brought us these boxes... besides religious books... we found music."

Since then, Tsaliuk and the choir, made up of about 20 members, have spent 20 years performing this music around the world. On Dec. 13, the Moscow Male Jewish Cappella makes its Canadian debut at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

"We've been travelling all around Europe, we've been [to] America, this is our first trip to Canada," Tsaliuk said.

"We know that the Jewish community in Toronto is very big... it was our dream to come one day to Canada."

Svetlana Dvoretskaia, the president of Show One Productions, is partly responsible for the choir's Canadian debut. While visiting Moscow several years ago, she met with Tsaliuk and has been working to bring the group to Toronto ever since.

"This choir is considered to be the most important and very unique Jewish choir in the world," she said. "They're the only ones who keep developing and working and keep singing traditional music and prayers."

The choir's concerts include Yiddish, Hebrew and Russian songs, as well as liturgical works and classical music, some of which was banned in Communist Russia.

Jewish choir considered to be unique in the world

For Tsaliuk, who graduated from Russia's Moscow Tchaikovsky Conservatory, the choir isn't just about music, it's about culture.

"Personally, it's like my baby. I've dedicated 20 years of my life to this choir," he said. "I really like this music. I think it's very unique. It's a huge, very rich slice of the musical culture."

Tsaliuk hopes the music will survive, despite declining interest in it. "We are singing classical Jewish music, composed in the 19th century. This music must survive for future generations," he said.

The choir doesn't have much competition, since there are only two or three professional groups dedicated to the same music in Europe, Tsaliuk said, adding that this isn't a good thing. Interest in the music is dwindling, not just in Moscow, but throughout the world, he said.

"We almost have no competition... this tradition is dying. In the world we have very big difficulties because of the pop culture," he added.

Tsaliuk said fewer musicians are studying classical Jewish music, and artists who perform it find it difficult to get funding.

"The government is absolutely not interested, private donors are not sure that this music is actually needed for the future," he said. "Now, because of [this] crisis, we're travelling less and less."

Dvoretskaia is seeing the same trend in Canada, she said.

Alexander Tsaliuk is the conductor of the Moscow Male Jewish Cappella.

"It's the government's policies, not enough attention has been... paid to the arts in the country," she said. "[The arts] forms the nation and makes the nation develop."

For Dvoretskaia, the choir's music is especially meaningful.

"If there's any music that means [something] to the Jewish community, it should be this music," she said of the choir's liturgical songs. "It's how we talk to God, that should be very close to every Jewish heart."

The Moscow Male Jewish Cappella performs at 7 p.m. on Dec. 13 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. Ticket prices range from $38 to $68. To buy tickets, call 416-872-1111 or visit www.ticketmaster.ca.

Canadian filmmaker looks at integration in Mississippi today

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The southern U.S. state of Mississippi has loomed large in Paul Saltzman's life.

In 1965, when he was 21, Saltzman went down to Mississippi – a bastion of the old Confederacy – to campaign for the civil rights of its downtrodden African-American citizens.

He was beaten by a Klansman and thrown into jail for 10 days.

More than 40 years later, as an established Canadian filmmaker with two Emmy Awards behind him, Saltzman returned to Mississippi. "I wanted to see how things had changed or not changed," he said.

While there, through a friend, he met the Hollywood actor Morgan Freeman, who had meanwhile moved back to Charleston, the Mississippi Delta town in which he had been raised. Inspired by Freeman's act, Saltzman made a documentary, Return to Mississippi, yet to be finished, about Freeman's return.

On the last day of the shoot, he learned that Freeman had years earlier offered to pay for the town's high school senior prom if it was integrated. The offer was ignored. Now, a decade later, Freeman was still interested in paying for it.

His assistant approached the school, and after some discussions, the principal agreed that the time had come for a mixed white/black prom. Intrigued by the idea, Saltzman shelved plans to complete Return to Mississippi and decided to make a film about the historic integration of the prom.

Prom Night in Mississippi, which premièred at the Sundance Film Festival last January, was broadcast by the HBO network last July. Currently playing in Toronto and Vancouver, it is scheduled to open in Montreal on Dec. 4.

Saltzman, the son of Percy Saltzman, Canada's first television weatherman, directed it in collaboration with his producer and second wife, Patricia Aquino (his first wife was the Indo-Canadian filmmaker Deepa Mehta).

To win the trust and co-operation of the school and its students, he and Aquino lived in Charleston for almost five months in 2008. "I told them, 'I don't have an axe to grind.'"

As a former fighter for civil rights in a state that had fiercely resisted integration and clung to the last public vestiges of racism, Saltzman was immensely pleased that the prom was finally integrated. "It was such a holdover from slavery and segregation. I was glad they did the right thing."

Saltzman, who is currently based in Oakville, Ont., was not entirely surprised by the school's decision to break with the past. Having visited Mississippi in 2006, he knew that it had undergone a fundamental transformation. As he put it in an interview last week, "Things had changed hugely. Mississippi has come farther and faster than any other state, although it had a much longer way to go than other states."

Much to his satisfaction, Prom Night in Mississippi was screened not only once but four times at the Oxford Film Festival in Mississippi, while the local media ran positive reviews.

It was a far cry from his hostile reception in 1960s Mississippi, where he had been a voter registration volunteer for the Student Non-Violent Co-ordinating Committee.

That Saltzman was drawn to civil rights was no coincidence.

His maternal grandfather was killed in a pogrom in Ukraine in the 1920s, an incident Saltzman's mother, Rose Kogan, personally witnessed. Further, Saltzman was brought up in a liberal household where the golden rule – do unto others as you would have them done unto you – was observed.

Saltzman's attraction to the U.S. civil rights movement was reinforced by the murder of three of its fieldworkers, James Cheney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner, in 1964.

On his first day in Jackson, Miss., Saltzman was assaulted and imprisoned. Twelve of his 16 cellmates were American Jews. He was the sole Canadian. Upon his release, he continued working for the committee in Mississippi.

"I felt good about myself for volunteering, though I don't consider myself a hero" he said. "I was deeply impacted by the hatred and injustice I saw."

After Mississippi, Saltzman went to India to study meditation, and there, in an ashram, he met the members of the pop group The Beatles. He photographed them, and in 2000, an American publisher released a book of his photographs.

Saltzman launched his film and television career as a CBC researcher. In 1973, he formed Sunrise Films Ltd., producing and directing a string of documentaries. Turning to drama in 1983, he created and produced the hit CBC/Disney Channel family action and adventure series, Danger Bay. Subsequently, he produced the TV shows My Secret Identity, Matrix and Max Glick and the movie Sam & Me.

Saltzman regards his latest project, Prom Night in Mississippi, as a vehicle for education and dialogue, having screened it at universities and high schools in Canada and the United States. The Southern Poverty Law Center, an anti-racist organization based in Alabama, has published a teacher's guide on it.

Barnes Brothers to perform at Al Green Theatre

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Musicians Daniel and Micah Barnes will be performing at a special Barnes Brothers night at the Al Green Theatre in Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre next month.

The brothers used to live across the street from the Miles Nadal JCC at Bloor and Spadina in Toronto. "It is a beautiful theatre and feels like home base for us in that neighbourhood way," Daniel says. "We have lots of memories going to what we called the Jewish Y and spending our youth swimming there with our dad."

Music runs in the Barnes family. Daniel is a drummer and singer, and Micah is a pianist and singer. They are the sons of musician and composer Milton Barnes, who died in 2001. Their mother is novelist Lilly Barnes, whose latest book, Mara, comes out in January.

Two years ago, the brothers organized a tribute night in honour of their father to celebrate his life and work – filling the house to capacity. "It worked surprisingly well to have my group and Micah's group on the same bill," Daniel says.

The first set of their upcoming show, on Dec. 5, begins with Daniel and his acoustic jazz quartet, including musicians Robi Botos, William Sperandei and Paul Novotny playing Daniel's original jazz compositions. Micah will join the quartet to sing with the band.

Daniel has released two CDs of his own, the most recent titled Classic Beauties. He is also a former member of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band.

"Daniel's tunes are so accessible – it is jazz the way our dad taught us," Micah says. "He told Daniel, 'If you're going to do something, you might as well make it something the audiences will really enjoy.'

"Daniel really thinks of his audience, and he makes the tunes memorable and fun. I think that is his strength and that is why I think CBC and Jazz.FM have really embraced his work, and that is why I want to work with him," Micah says. "Daniel is a deep thinker about music, much the way our father was."

The second half of the show will showcase Micah's trio, which features Daniel on drums and vocals, Novotny on bass and himself on piano and vocals.

Micah, who recently moved back to Toronto from Los Angeles, was a member of The Nylons and released two solo CDs, including his latest, a self-titled album. He was the vocal coach on the CBC Television hit reality singing competition, How Do You Solve a Problem Like Maria.

"I learned so much about melody and harmony and what makes a good song while I was in The Nylons," Micah says. "The Nylons were my finishing school as a musician. They taught me to respect and trust the audiences' instincts. My job as a singer is to find the material that moves the audience to joy, to tears and gives them something to walk away singing. The new material we are presenting will be some of the most singalongable music that people have ever heard from me."

Daniel says that when he and his brother play together, it gives them both an opportunity to broaden their horizons. "Micah has a jazz background and I have a pop background, so it is a chance to put that all on the table and create quite a diverse evening of musical entertainment."

Special guest Lorraine Segato, of the 1980s band the Parachute Club, will also perform in the second half of the show, singing some of her rootsy original tunes. The evening will culminate with a Motown medley.

The Barnes Brothers met Segato in the '80s, at the height of the Queen Street West music scene, and used to open for the Parachute Club. Micah also sang backup on the group's records, learning to harmonize years before joining The Nylons.

For tickets to the Barnes Brothers in concert, visit www.mnjcc.org. Showtime is 8 p.m. For more information, visit www.danielbarnes.net and www.micahbarnes.com.

Writing and extreme circumstances

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

The words "public intellectual" don't conjure too many faces in Canada these days.

A couple of candidates – Michael Ignatieff and John Ralston Saul – have made efforts to wed a political role with weighty ideas. But one feels the strain, on the part of Ignatieff, to represent both a party line and his own creative projects; while Ralston Saul can clearly write more directly about themes close to his heart now that he is no longer doing the rounds as the governor general's other half.

Norman Ravvin

Historically, certain writing lives in this country have had a broad impact, beyond the words on the page. Margaret Atwood continues in this role, as a representative figure for issues related to the earth's ecological future, and, more surprisingly, the meaning of debt in a time of economic crisis. Mordecai Richler, up to his death, functioned as a kind of lightning rod in his home province, where his writings and pronouncements on Quebec nationalism were taken by some as a political affront.

In his new collection of essays, What the Furies Bring (Porcupine's Quill), Kenneth Sherman places himself in the role of a writer whose ideas might lead by example. The essays, all written after the events of Sept. 11, 2001, ask questions regarding historical catastrophe, the worth of the creative life, and in what way writing – especially poetry – can offer a proper response to "the most extreme circumstances."

Sept. 11 is his starting point, but Sherman's most probing and affecting essays reach back to the European disasters of the Holocaust and the Soviet Gulag. It is in discussing the link between these and the creative life that Sherman is most provocative – even at times devastating – as he outlines the manner in which creative minds respond to what most of us would acknowledge to be the worst circumstances in human history.

In Varlam Shalamov: Poet of the Frozen Inferno, Sherman introduces a writer little read in the West, whose writings, after a 17-year incarceration in the Siberian Gulag of Kolyma, are offered as an alternative and corrective to the celebrated work of Alexander Solzhenitsyn. Sherman effectively conveys what Shalamov viewed as his effort "to write something that would not be literature," a "new prose" or "documentary fiction" that would treat the Gulag on its own terms, without resorting to conventional fictional strategies.

In his investigation of a better-known writer, Vasily Grossman, Sherman recognizes the value of a more traditional writerly empathy. At the end of almost 1,000 days reporting from the Soviet front, Grossman was the first experienced writer to report and publish a response to the Allied liberation of Treblinka. In The Hell of Treblinka, which appeared in a Russian literary journal in the fall of 1944, he described his discovery, regardless of German efforts to bury their crime, of "strands of blond hair 'glowing like brass' and 'heavy black plaits' from a sack of women's hair that had not been taken away."

Sherman's efforts to uncover guidance in the creative responses to Sept. 11 are less provocative, because the work under discussion is not as strong as that which he can draw on from the European context. Although he is willing to find wisdom in John Updike's novel Terrorist and Martin Amis' ongoing efforts to understand the mind of a figure such as Muhammad Atta (the hijacker in control of the first plane to strike the World Trade Center on Sept. 11), even sympathetic readings of these works do not convince the reader that they should enter the canon of what might be called a literature of extremity. Sherman wonders if the flood of responses in literature and film to Sept. 11 came too soon, a kind of "immediate testimony" that too often over-reaches, sentimentalizes and editorializes when a more controlled tone is needed.

In the essay Who Knows You Here? Sherman reveals his own skill at bringing careful thought to an account of difficult memories. Though it centres on a recollection of his grandfather, a mainstay in his tailor shop, first on Spadina Avenue and then College Street, the essay's turning point is the painful story of a great-grandfather who came to Canada from Poland in 1936 and found the place unlivable. Standing on the corner of College and Euclid Avenue, he "stared at the traffic, and uttered one word – the Yiddish for 'zombie.'" His decision to return to Poland was followed by his murder at the hands of a German Einsatzgruppe.

In his preface to What the Furies Bring, Sherman stakes out the collection's view of a writer's responsibility. As reality "bombards the modern writer," he says, "it is reasonable to feel overwhelmed. Yet the true writer – not the propagandist or the giddy experimenter – is engaged with a difficult dialogue with the real."

Norman Ravvin's books include Hidden Canada: An Intimate Travelogue and the story collection Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish. He is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Sports leagues aim at attracting Jewish kids

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Prosserman Jewish Community Centre has entered a strategic partnership with a sports management company in a bid to attract children to all-Jewish sports leagues.

The new entity will operate sports leagues for the Prosserman JCC as JCC Chai Sports, a successor to the successful Chai Life Sports, which had offered soccer, baseball and hockey to young Jewish athletes.

Jeremy Blustein and Alex Voihanski, the partners behind Chai Life Sports, say the alliance with the JCC will permit them to continue a project geared at bringing Jewish children together through athletics.

Chai Life Sports, which began operations 1-1/2 years ago, had a vision that went beyond a mere business operation. Both Blustein and Voihanski saw sports as a tool to bring unaffiliated youngsters under a Jewish community umbrella. Chai Life presented the opportunity of "building community one game at a time," said Blustein.

With the association with the JCC, "our mandate is to build future community leaders through sports," he added.

This past summer, Chai Life Sports operated soccer and T Ball leagues on municipal sports fields that attracted 170 kids in Thornhill, Ont.

Hockey and learn-to-skate programs started recently at the Pavilion Fitness Club in Thornhill, with more than 100 children aged five and older participating. Hockey, which is geared for five- to eight-year-olds, is in effect "a Jewish house league," Blustein said.

Basketball tipped off a few weeks ago at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Family Education Centre, with six- to 13-year-olds the target age group.

Adult sports are also on offer, including a floor hockey league with eight teams at the Garnet A. Williams Community Centre, indoor soccer at the Soccer Centre, a three-division, 24-team basketball league held at the Kimel Centre, plus a six-team hockey league at the Pavilion.

Brian Keshen, executive director of the Prosserman JCC, said "our objective at the JCC is to build community and we know sports is a great way to build community."

While Blustein and Voihanski were pursuing their own vision of Jewish sports leagues, the JCC had been doing something similar. It occurred to him there would be overlap and competition for the same demographic. "Why not work together?" he said.

Blustein said he and Voihanski – who ran B'nai Brith's athletic programs – were approached by Keshen about a year ago at the GetCentred event, which showcased a variety of community education options. Both sides saw "a natural fit" and an agreement was reached for Chai Life to run JCC sports programs.

Blustein said the venture has proven successful so far, and there are plans to expand the program's reach south to Wilson Avenue next season. There are also plans for a further expansion as far south as St. Clair, he added.

Until the Bathurst JCC and the Schwartz/Reisman Centre at Rutherford Road are completed, Chai Sports will continue to book municipal fields for summer sports at various locations in Toronto and Vaughan, Ont. Locating outdoor sports such as soccer and baseball on turf fields at Toronto-area JCCs – as is done in the United States – would be ideal, he said.

Keshen said the JCC has traditionally been a family oriented centre that included an important sports component. The alliance with Chai Sports has permitted the JCC to attract and retain members while the Schwartz/Reisman Centre at Rutherford and the Bathurst JCC are completed.

"We have the same interests in mind for the community," added Blustein. "We share the same MO, to use sports to build community."

Toronto centre brings communities together

SAJUR, Israel — Canadian board members and other dignitaries took part in the dedication of the Israel Tennis Center's (ITC's) newest centre dedicated to breaking down barriers between different communities in the heart of the Galilee.

"We are extremely proud of our latest coexistence initiative," said ITC international chair Kevin Green.

"Sport is one of the purest ways we can build trust and respect among individuals from different backgrounds. We remain committed to providing programming for children that inspires co-operation through the universal language and power of sports," said Green, who also serves as president of the Israel Children's Centres, the Canadian fundraising arm of the ITC.

The ITC's newest project is located in Sajur, a village of 4,000 east of Haifa surrounded predominantly by Druse, Christian Arab and Muslim Arab villages, as well as Jewish towns and the city of Karmiel. The Sajur Tennis Center is operating at full speed, working with the National Schmid Committee for Youth at Risk and the Kennedy-Leigh Foundation to cater to 1,500 kindergarten students in an environment stressing the appreciation and acceptance of different cultures and religions.

The ITC operates 14 sports centres across Israel. Some 350,000 people have graduated from ITC programs throughout its 30-year history.

Planning for end-stage dementia

By MICHAEL GORDON

It was an unusual day. The patients and families that I saw in my clinic, as well as a case presented to me by the resident at ethics rounds and one brought to me for advice by an attending physician, all dealt with understanding end-of-life issues in individuals suffering from dementia.

The Senior Side of Life

It confirmed something that I've been increasingly aware of over the past few years: many families are in denial about the natural history of diseases that cause dementia. They often don't consider what they'll do when they face difficult choices on behalf of their loved ones.

The Alzheimer's Society has tried to educate families about these issues, but many families prefer to focus on available treatments, even though they're told that the medications may improve function for a limited period of time and may decrease the rate of decline. But the diseases that cause dementia, whether Alzheimer's or one of the other types such as vascular dementia (caused by blood vessel disease) all follow similar courses of continuous deterioration.

The difficult part for families is to acknowledge that, like many other diseases that afflict older people – such as heart disease, kidney disease and cancer, for which we now categorize treatment as "chronic disease management" – they all eventually enter a terminal phase after periods that vary from months to years. It's in this terminal phase, which is most readily acknowledged in the malignant disease categories, that individuals and their families should understand what their loved one's preferences for care might be.

Most people, when asked while healthy and aware enough to answer, would include concepts such as comfort, lack of suffering, a degree of dignity and engagement, respect for their wishes and values and perhaps other values that people – such as those with strong religious convictions or beliefs – might have.

The families in my clinic were puzzled when – after we discussed their parents' medications – I said it was important that they be clear as a family about decisions they would make when things deteriorated seriously.

Even though I had mentioned the issue, they invariably looked puzzled. One daughter asked, "Like what?" I gave examples such as living arrangements, artificial nutrition and hydration, and major medical interventions that might be proposed. The members of one family admitted they found it hard to consider such issues when their mother was "managing," despite evidence of definite and continuous decline in her mental and physical functions.

I highlighted the consequences of not having those discussions by providing an example of two siblings who, as their mother's situation deteriorated, were at opposite ends of the interventions scale.

The mother, suffering from end-stage dementia, was non-communicative and bedridden and unable to provide any self care. She could also no longer eat. They agreed to not provide artificial nutrition and hydration, in keeping with what they thought would be their mother's wishes, but one sibling wanted her transferred to a general hospital when she developed an infection and the other was preparing for the end, not wanting anything done but "comfort care." One would think that they were from different families, and their mother and the health care staff were caught in the middle of a difficult family conflict.

Communication and long-term consideration and planning by families are key to making sure that end-of-life care issues are discussed and explored, in order to maintain family peace and provide a dignified end for those we hold so dear.

POTATO LATKES WITH APPLES

1 lb russet potatoes, peeled
1 apple, peeled and cored
1 large egg
1/4 c flour
salt ground pepper canola oil
powdered sugar

Grate potatoes and apples in food processor (work quickly to avoid discoloration). Squeeze out liquid. Add egg and flour, salt and pepper to taste. Mix well. In large non-stick skillet, heat enough oil to cover bottom of the pan. Spoon batter into pan, being careful not to crowd. Cook until crisp and brown on one side, then turn and fry on other side. Keep finished pancakes warm in oven as pancakes are fried. Drain on paper towels. Sprinkle with powdered sugar if desired just before serving. Yield: 10.

Start supper with soup

Soup is a great start to any meal in these chilly winter months. It's a warm, comforting food, and it can help you lose weight or maintain your weight.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

You can fill up or bring down your hunger level at the beginning of a meal with soup, often in a low-calorie way. You do need to choose soups that are vegetable based or made from stock, and have no added butter, cheese, cream or large amounts of starch.

But that leaves tons of fabulous flavours to choose from, including mushroom, tomato, squash, cauliflower, onion, broccoli, vegetable, minestrone, chicken, fish, beet and pepper soup. Many of these have virtually no calories, so you are starting the meal with a food that will warm you, nourish you with vitamins, provide fluids and, most importantly, lead you to eating less of the meal or feeling more satiated afterward.

It takes 20 minutes for our metabolism to shut off from the time we start to eat until our brain and stomach effectively communicate with each other that no more food is needed. Because most Canadians eat dinner in five to 10 minutes, we finish a full portion but still feel hungry, because our brain is saying so, even though our stomach is full. By starting a meal with soup, a hot food that requires slow eating because of its heat and high liquid content, we can stretch out the amount of time we spend eating dinner, as well as fill up on a healthful food.

So this winter start your meals with soup. By adding meat, fish, soy or legumes to soup, you can turn it into a balanced meal. Here's to staying warm and healthy this winter!

'Fear diminishes humanity,' author says

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

When Rabbi Harold Kushner started writing a book about fear, his first thoughts turned to illness and death.

He never considered public speaking.

But during his research, Rabbi Kushner, an Conservative American rabbi and author of Conquering Fear: Living Boldly in an Uncertain World, found that speaking in public was one of the most common fears that people have.

Rabbi Harold Kushner

"The fear of rejection... I think that's the real fear," he said during a lecture at Beth Sholom Synagogue on Nov. 12. "To be told, in a love situation or a professional situation that you're of no use to us… is absolutely devastating."

Rabbi Kushner's answer to fear was simple: God.

"God doesn't want us to be afraid. Being afraid diminishes our humanity… So how do you cope?" he asked. "When life hurts and you cry out for God… He sends you people."

He also sends courage, Rabbi Kushner added.

"For me, that's the proof of God."

The rabbi, who is perhaps best known for his best-selling book When Bad Things Happen to Good People, learned this lesson about courage first hand when his son, Aaron, was born.

At the age of three, Aaron was diagnosed with progeria, a rare degenerative disease in which children display symptoms of aging. Children diagnosed with progeria rarely live past their teens. Aaron died two days after his 14th birthday.

"[My wife and I] found qualities in ourselves… to love him and raise him and one day, to mourn for him," he said.

In his last three months, Aaron had to sleep standing up because of his medical issues.

"Every morning, he'd awake for a day filled with pain, but he looked forward to that day."

Rabbi Kushner used this as an example of why he doesn't support euthanasia.

"Pain is the physical result of things [that happen]. Suffering is the emotional response. Whether we find it bearable is a choice."

During his lecture, Rabbi Kushner also addressed the fear of change, which, in his opinion, manifests itself in religious fundamentalism.

He used the example of the denial of female and gay rights in religion.

"I suspect a lot of traditionalists… I think they're saying, 'Can't there be… something that will just remain familiar?'" he said. "Change is a way of life."

Fear also comes from a lack of control, Rabbi Kushner said, especially when it comes to natural disasters.

"One of the things that scares us is the ubiquity of the forces of nature," he said. "The problem is there is no place safe from natural disasters."

As a rabbi, he often hears people ask why God would send earthquakes and hurricanes, a question he heard often after Hurricane Katrina.

"God is loving, nature is blind… God was not in the hurricane. God was in the voice that tells you what to do afterwards," he said. "Nature can't tell the difference between a good person and a bad person… you will find God in your ability to survive a disaster."

During a question-and-answer period, Rabbi Kushner addressed the issue of anger, specifically being angry at God.

"If you can't be angry at someone, you don't really love them," he said. "God wants us… to rage, to curse… to get it out of your system and when you've done that, to realize that God is on your side."

Jet Entertainment shoots to the top

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

When Jet Entertainment does an event, its main goal is to make it all about the customer.

"It's not the Jet Entertainment show, it's the John Schwartz bar mitzvah," said Jody Litvack, owner of Jet Entertainment.

"We want that night to revolve around them, not our company. I wouldn't call us discreet, but we make people feel special more than on a 'You are the crowd, watch us perform' basis. We get involved, we make people feel more comfortable."

Jet Entertainment

Jet Entertainment was launched in January 2009 after Litvack returned to Toronto from spending two years in Los Angeles, Calif. Litvack started Jet because he felt the industry needed something different. In this case, different meant a company that emphasizes having great DJs and great music, and getting involved with the crowd instead of just standing on stage and handing out prizes.

Clearly Jet is doing something right, as they've already been called the fastest-growing new company for private events in Toronto, Litvack said.

"A lot of my competitors today are out there, and they're putting on amazing big shows, whereas we are all about the party," said Litvack, who started working in the industry, with Mandell Entertainment, when he was 14. "It's not about putting on a great show. We want the guests to feel as though they were a part of the event, not a spectator at the event.

"We really just let loose, we don't think too much – we go out there and have a good time and we're ourselves. I feel that, from what I've heard, it lets the people on the dance floor be out there having a good time," he added.

Jet Entertainment offers many different packages, but they're willing to customize each package depending on the event and what the client wants.

"We have very high-demand, high-end events we do, where clients really do require full service and we're able to provide that for them. However, some people just want to have a nice, intimate event, and in that respect, we've created packages for pretty much anyone who wants to have an event with just a guy coming out and playing music," Litvack said.

"We're able to dissect a package, and if you don't want [something], we're not going to include it. We really customize each package to each event, making the client feel happy about spending whatever they wanted to spend."

Aside from being used for their entertainment services, Jet has a large production and lighting division. They're also involved heavily in musical branding, which is customizing the music a company plays and branding them through what people hear.

Litvack's favourite part of being in the entertainment industry, he said, is getting to be a part of important events in people's lives.

"The most rewarding thing is knowing you are going to be a significant part of one of the most important days in either a person's or a family's life," he said. "The fact that I and my company get to share and create that evening is really what it's all about for me."

Stores offer many different gift options

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

If you're looking to buy fine gifts, look no further than William Ashley and Lilliane & Robin's Fine Jewellery.

The name William Ashley has been synonymous with fine china and giftware for the last 60 years. Currently located at 55 Bloor Street West in Toronto, their 24,000 –square– foot store is perfect for the shopper who is looking for the very best in unique giftware.

Lilliane Moses has been selling fine jewelry in Toronto for the last 20 years. In 2000 she partnered with Robin Graham to create Lilliane & Robin's Fine Jewellery, located at the Hotel InterContinental at 220 Bloor Street West.

According to William Ashley's manager Jackie Chiesa, some of their most popular lines include such familiar names as Michael Aram, Blomus, Riva, Leonardo, Nambe and Alessi. These popular lines offer the latest and greatest in gifts for housewarmings, bridal showers, birthdays and hostesses for this holiday season.

With the Michael Aram line one can purchase a wide variety of combination nickel silver and silver plated gifts. Chiesa believes that the Michael Aram line is a "more contemporary line that looks like art." The line includes stunning bowls, vases, pitchers, napkin holders and more. All of Michael Aram's items are functional and fall into the $100 to $500 price range.

Liliane & Robin's Fine Jewellery

Moses has enjoyed a solid and steady following at her jewelry store over the past 20 years, which has led to second generation customers. Families have grown with her, and a bar mitzvah boy who received an initial ring when she started is now coming back to pick out an engagement ring. According to Moses, 90 per cent of her sales are repeat business.

In terms of their inventory, some of the jewellery sold at Lilliane & Robin's Fine Jewellery is from estate sales. "We break it up, redesign it and make it modern," Moses said, and it helps save her customers money.

Moses also offers completely new and modern pieces. For bar and bat mitzvah gifts she sells a lot of initial rings and watches.

William Ashley's other popular lines also blend functionality with aesthetics. For example, Blomus is a contemporary line consisting of brushed stainless steel items. Nambe uses alternative metals, cast and pressed aluminums, so their items are heat and cold retentive and do not need the kind of routine maintenance silver requires.

Chiesa points out that most of these lines make traditional Jewish gifts such as menorahs, kiddush cups, seder plates and shabbat candle holders, which make them very popular on wedding registries. The gift merchandise on bridal registries tends to be more popular than purchasing a place setting because people "want to give something distinctive; people want more of an identity to their gifts."

William Ashley's wedding registry remains one of the most popular draws to their store, however, Chiesa reminds that one can also register for housewarming and birthday parties. She also mentions that at William Ashley, beautiful items can be found for as little as $10 or as much as $1,000, and that when you choose a piece from the store you are picking something with good style.

Lilliane & Robin's Fine Jewellery recently started carrying silver jewelry. According to Moses, her silver pieces are perfect for someone looking for something beautiful but is not looking to spend a lot of money. Moses is aware of the current state of the economy and wants to appeal to not only her clients needs but to their wallets as well. For example, anyone who mentions this article while making a purchase of $200 or more at the store will receive $50 off their purchase.

For engagement rings, platinum is popular, and for wedding bands, titanium is being seen more and more. For bridesmaids gifts, Moses has sold a lot of pearls, silver earrings and large pendants this year. Dangling long earrings are also very popular because the bridesmaids can wear them on the wedding day and long after the wedding is over. For groomsmen, cufflinks remain a favourite gift.

The jewelry at Lilliane & Robin's Fine Jewellery is, for the most part, one of a kind.

"We are very much a service based jewellery store. Our store is geared to customer service — each piece made to [suit] the wants and needs of my clients. I always try to fit their desires to their budget so that when they leave they are completely satisfied."

For more information on William Ashley call 416-964-2900 or visit www.williamashley.com. For Lilliane & Robin's Fine Jewellery, contact Lilliane Moses at 416-920-7676 or email info@lrfjewels.com.

Edith's offers beautiful formalwear at reasonable prices

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Edith's Fashions (416-633-4222) has built a reputation in its 25 years of business for serving women who seek beautiful, unique and high quality formalwear at reasonable prices. Located at 245 Wilmington Ave., the store began as a relatively small endeavour and quickly expanded into the two-floor, 8,000-square-foot space that it is today.

"Due to word of mouth and thousands of referrals, Edith's has become one of the top eveningwear boutiques in Ontario," says Clare Nisker, Edith's head buyer and artistic director. "We bring only the best quality and styles for a reasonable price for our customers, and that's why they keep coming back."

"Edith's is known for being a one-stop shop for your eveningwear needs," Nisker says. "We have busy clients ranging from career women to busy stay-at-home moms who just don't have the time to start looking around for shoes and jewellery, so we have brought in a wide selection of jewellery, some custom made and exclusive just for Edith's."

At Edith's, there's something for everyone. There is a vast selection of special occasion gowns for all occasions, including for the mother of the bride, grandmothers and guests of all ages, with long ball gowns and short, trendy cocktail dresses. Suits for all occasions are also a huge draw at Edith's, as they can be altered to perfection.

Edith's carries brands that have a long-standing reputation for reasonable prices and excellent quality ranging from the most exquisite flowing silk chiffons to luxurious silk shantungs.

The Edith's team travels the world to find the best that the industry has to offer.

"Our buyers' mentality is this: 'Would I want to wear this gown?'" Nisker says. "It's a personal business and our clients feel the warmth and sincerity with our experienced and knowledgeable sales associates."

What's more, the Edith's team treats each and every item as if it were one of a kind. "Evening gowns, unlike sweaters, cannot be bought off the rack or online and taken home," Nisker says. "The woman's body is so technical, there is not one size fits all strategy when it comes to eveningwear – bust, waist, hip and length are unique and special to every woman.

"Our alteration facility is top of the line, with the latest machinery, and everything is done on the premises of Edith's. We have clients coming from out of the province and even out of the country, and we have the ability to alter their gown the same day [and] if not, the next day.

"We carry gowns from size 2 to 26 all year round, so a size 16 doesn't have to look at a size 10 dress and try to picture what she will look like," Nisker says.

Qualified and schooled seamstresses, with the knowledge and understanding of the construction of even the most complicated evening gowns, are on the premises to make sure that your outfit fits like a glove.

"Many clients choose to personalize their gowns, which only qualified seamstresses can do by adding sleeves, draping shawls to the dress or making them removable," says Nisker. "The secret is to make it seem as though the gown came like that."

Edith's Fashions

Edith's Fashions

Constantly expanding, Edith's is relocating to a brand new space in 2010.

"We are currently busy finishing the new space while we are starting our up to 90 per cent sale to clear some stock that will not be moving to the new location – it's an amazing opportunity to shop at even lower prices!

"We [are] very confident in our boutique because we think from a client's perspective: we wouldn't shop anywhere else. We know we have the best selection and we know we can fix anything; there are no limits with what we can do to a gown," says Nisker.

"Being a specialty boutique, our services are needed, wanted and appreciated by our clients and we look forward to serving them for many years to come."

Invitations are an important part of any event

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

Invitations are probably one of the most important things when it comes to planning a party, as without them no one will know about it.

As a fairly new company, Pistachio is meeting the needs of environmentally conscious, socially minded customers. Launched Oct. 14, 2008, Pistachio's current Canadian locations are at 2433 Yonge Street (Yonge and Eglinton), (416-322-9451) Yorkdale Shopping Centre (416-256-3845), and items are also sold in Indigo and Chapters.

According to Pistachio's President Kirsten Chapman, the company's mission is to "provide products and services that are good for you and good for the planet." This includes products that are organic, fair trade and/or produced locally or handmade. For example, Pistachio's custom invitations are made from 100 per cent recycled paper which is also made locally.

Invitations by Design, located at 831 Glencairn Ave. has been creating custom invitations for every occasion since 1993. Owner Darcia Moskaluk-Rutkay provides a one stop shop for all your printing needs, providing customers with her expertise, ideas and excellent customer service.

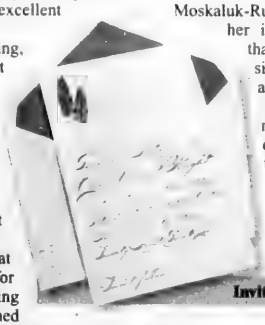
Whether you are celebrating a wedding, anniversary, birthday or a bar or bat mitzvah, Moskaluk-Rutkay emphasizes that quality is paramount, and Invitations by Design offers a wonderful product for a great price. She believes that her clients are driven by price and beauty, which is why the cost of her invitations is important. She wants her customers to get the very best but not have to break the bank to get it.

At Pistachio, Chapman recognizes that in an invitation a customer is looking for great design first, however, a growing portion of the population is also concerned about the environment. It is here that Pistachio meet the needs of their clients by providing an environmentally friendly solution to one's stationery needs. Chapman believes it is now a part of a child's DNA to be concerned about making eco-friendly decisions, so Pistachio offers birthday party invitations and boxed notes to suit a wide variety of invitation needs.

Pistachio recently launched their wedding line. Pistachio's wedding invitation album features 18 different options, all including an invitation, thank you and RSVP card. Pistachio also offers a digital design bar, where a customer can come in to design an original invitation for as little as $25 for 30 minutes with a graphic designer on staff.

"We take the aggravation out of invitation ordering," Moskaluk-Rutkay says of Invitations by Design. With her individually designed invitations, reply, thank you and place cards, most of your simchah printing needs can be taken care of all in one place.

They can also stuff, send and even monitor the replies if the customer so desires. She is quick to remind that they try "to do everything as easily as possible for the customer." Invitations by Design can also print your event giveaways like bookmarks or custom wrappers for chocolate bars as well.

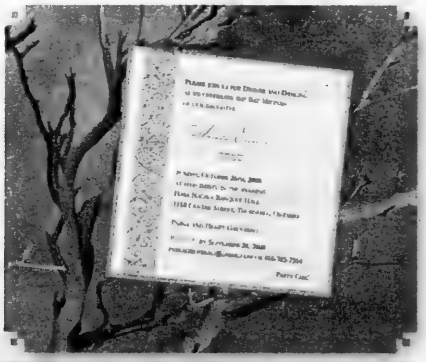


Invitation created by Pistachio

For weddings, simple and elegant invitations are key words for today's bride and groom. Moskaluk-Rutkay says that "some papers are so gorgeous on their own you don't need anything else."

With so much to choose from, Moskaluk-Rutkay has some lovely examples of current invitation trends available in store. Bold colours are very popular, as is using black and white with bold contrasts. When discussing fonts, she displays beautiful examples of formal invitations that use all lowercase lettering and formatless formatting – all the information appears in a run-on sentence that flows through a paragraph instead of being displayed line by line.

According to Chapman, bridal invitations are now sporting a simpler modern look. Instead of using a lot of traditional script, people are including personal touches like a photograph. She believes that people want to come in and create their own original invitation to represent their personal style. Invitations are more "fashion inspired" and there is a tendency to use more browns and reds than ever before.



Invitations by Design

Ultimately, the people at Pistachio saw an opportunity to make eco-friendly, custom invitations accessible to the public. Making custom invitations easy and affordable has made Pistachio a future leader in the invitation design market. For more information, visit www.epistachio.com or email custom@epistachio.com.

Moskaluk-Rutkay suggests those planning a special event come see her at least five to six months before the event, and be ready to order.

For great customer care, visit Darcia Moskaluk-Rutkay at Invitations by Design or call 416-789-7367, email info@invitebydesign or visit their website at www.invitebydesign.com.

Photographer captures personality, not perfection

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

When asked what he enjoys about photography, Elliot Sylman answered, "capturing the good times on film." He's been doing just that for the past 24 years, under his photography company Elliot Sylman Photography.

Sylman photographs at bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings, sometimes for the same family.

In his work, Sylman's goal is to shoot people while they are looking their most natural and relaxed.

"[I] like doing natural pictures," he said. "I'm not looking for perfection, I'm looking for personality. I'm just trying to make it an enjoyable day for people. I want them to relax, to have a good time. Seeing how happy everybody is on the day and seeing it all come together is amazing," he said, adding that he's taken a lot of pictures of families.

"The ones that are the best are the ones that want things to look as they look. Not someone to look better than they actually look.

"I like recording people and seeing the final image."

In addition to shooting at events, Sylman also takes photos of seniors, more specifically Holocaust survivors. This year, he went to Ottawa in April to take photos at the Holocaust Remembrance Day ceremony. The photos were later published in The Canadian Jewish News.

He has travelled extensively, photographing people all over the world, including Austria, Holland, France, Germany and Israel.

When it comes to choosing a photographer for your special event, Sylman does not recommend settling on the first one you meet.

"[Clients] should take a look at several photographers and see who they feel most comfortable with…a lot of us can do a good job, and you're really buying personality, because you want somebody you can get along with.

"I tell people all the time to take a look at my stuff, and then to look around, because you wouldn't want to make the wrong choice. No one's going to be happy otherwise. I'm not going to be happy and they're not going to be happy."

What will make Sylman's potential clients happy is that he offers a lot of different packages for every possible budget.

"I have a package where I just shoot everything and give people the files so they can look after it themselves. It gives people a chance to not have to pay for it all now," he said.

"I'm happy to try to help. I want people to be comfortable."

Musical, meaningful gifts from Mirvish

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

Looking for a meaningful, out-of-the-ordinary gift for the newly-weds who have it all, that couple marking a very special anniversary, or even a bar or bat mitzvah or Chanukah gift? Take them out to the theatre, or let them choose a production themselves that suits their tastes and schedule.

With Mirvish Productions (416-872-1212; online at mirvish.com), there's no limit to the gift possibilities, and the current season is one of the most exciting in recent years, says director of communications John Karastamatis.

"We have some familiar titles, some new titles, some big musicals, some dramas, some comedies... something for everyone."

Sharing the gift of theatre is more flexible than ever before. Choose tickets for a specific production or give a gift certificate, leaving the date – or production – options more open-ended. Gift certificates never expire, so there's no hurry to use it, either.

This season's musicals have Karastamatis particularly excited. A musical version of Young Frankenstein, which he calls "about as pure Mel Brooks as you can get," will draw in not only fans of the original movie, but their children and grandchildren, with its irreverent humour.

"It's intergenerational," he says.

Although Brooks can't read music, he created all the tunes himself; they were recorded by the show's musical director and turned into a formal score.

"The melodies are fantastic," Karastamatis says.

Other family-friendly shows coming soon include a touring production of Rent, and for a slightly younger crowd, Little House on the Prairie. Teenagers and their parents alike may enjoy the Canadian premiere of Rock of Ages, a tribute to several classic rock bands that has already astonished the New York Times.

And then there's Fiddler on the Roof, a production that will now star Harvey Fierstein as Tevye. Chaim Topol, who starred in the 1971 film version of the play and was scheduled to perform here, had to back out of what would have been his farewell tour because of a shoulder injury. Fierstein, who is a four-time Tony Award winner, played the same role to critical acclaim in the 2005 Broadway production.

This tale of love and laughter needs no introduction, yet today's younger generation may never have been exposed to the movie.

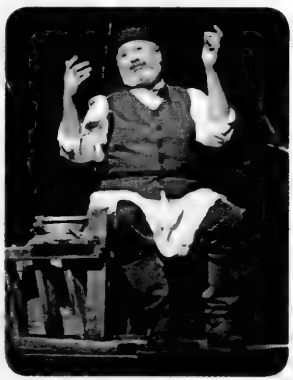
What could be a more appropriate gift for a Jewish occasion than this show about the enduring strength of family and tradition?

"People aren't buying two tickets, they're buying seven, eight, nine... extended families are coming," Karastamatis says.

And they aren't just coming for the show. Full celebration packages available at any Mirvish theatre include dinner for 10 to 15 people in a private suite before the show, drinks and hors d'oeuvres during intermission and the option of backstage tours and intimate sessions with the actors.

The theatres themselves are available for larger celebrations at times when no production is scheduled. Even the historic Canon Theatre is a possibility for weddings or other large-scale occasions.

"Theatre lovers can't imagine a more special place to have their special day," Karastamatis says. "Our venues are quite special... Anything is possible, we're open to ideas."



Harvey Fierstein as Tevye.

One family celebrated a 90th birthday party in a Mirvish theatre, and others have proposed during a show, though not during the actual performance.

Mirvish can recommend one of a number of caterers, or hosts can bring in their own caterer if they're planning a kosher event.

But, of course, it's about more than just a wonderful dinner party. An evening at the theatre depends on the quality of the production, and the current season is first rate.

Beyond longer-running plays and musicals, including new productions of Grease, Legally Blonde (a musical) and the return of Mamma Mia!, this season also includes special events such as an upcoming evening with Patti LuPone and Mandy Patinkin, as well as Rain, a live multimedia Beatles tribute.

Whatever the occasion, it's all about figuring out what the recipient will enjoy. With the many options Mirvish has to offer this season, all you have to do is choose the gift of live theatre... and then relax, knowing they'll enjoy a truly special entertainment experience.

Caterers dish up traditional food with a modern twist

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

The face of catering has changed dramatically over the past 30 years. When catering a simchah with Peter Graben Caterers you can receive a customized menu ranging from traditional Jewish cuisine like matzah ball soup to unique Asian inspired dishes and everything in between.

Peter Graben has been in the catering business since 1970. His family's history in the business dates back to when they were living in Glasgow, Scotland. It is in Glasgow that Graben worked as a chef for seven years, and received certificates for kitchen management from the City and Guilds of London Institute.

Graben likens his boutique catering business to theatre.

"What we really do is theatre; the venue is our stage, the guests are our audience and the cast is our professional team of chefs, bartenders and serving staff," he said.

As an independent caterer, Graben's clients are mostly those hosting events in homes and offices. He prides himself on serving exceptional food, saying that he has "a deep respect for the provenance of all our ingredients." Every menu is custom built to live up to Graben's mantra to serve the community the best in Jewish cuisine.

Graben caters for a wide array of events including team building parties, birthdays, bar and bat mitzvahs, barbecues, grand openings, press conferences, galas, product launches and more

He attracts a lot of non-Jewish corporate accounts because his clients like the high quality of his food and the way it is presented.

Whether it is chicken soup served in a glass beaker with tiny matzah balls, green tea sorbet, macaroni and cheese or slow braised beef short ribs, Peter Graben offers creative solutions for your catering needs. For more information, contact Peter Graben at 416-967-1818 or e-mail info@grabengrub.com. Visit his website at www.petergraben.com.

Chapman's Specialty Foods, located at 3-1875 Leslie Street, has been in the catering business since 1983. Offering complete service catering, Chapman's provides traditional Jewish dishes, staffing rentals, delivery and retail.

With one of the largest selections of prepared foods in the city, Chapman's does everything from traditional to continental to fusion foods. Owner Steve Resnick boasts that "we also like to do something a little off the wall," like veal brisket with apricot sauce, which he believes adds another dimension to the traditional brisket.

Chapman's Specialty Foods

Resnick feels that "a large part of my job is to make people's lives easy." He knows he has had a successful event if the food was sensational and the hosts did not have to lift a finger. Many times after Resnick caters an event he is told that his affair was the first time a host could really enjoy themselves at their own simchah. He believes it is because of his great staff that make his clients feel at ease.

Chapman's creates eclectic, original and unique custom menus for all their clients. Whether you are catering for a special occasion, office lunch, home gathering or holiday party, Chapman's can assist in your event planning, staffing and rental needs.

Chapman's does a lot of business during Passover and the holidays — they often need to rent extra equipment to meet all the orders.

Although Chapman's is not kosher, Resnick has met the requests of clients who ask for kosher meat to be served at their simchah. Resnick is so dedicated to his customers that for one kosher meat request he went to the butcher himself to make sure he was receiving the exact cut of meat the recipe required to make the dish live up to his standards.

Some of Chapman's wonderful offerings include mini phyllo cups with wild mushrooms, a soft Asian wrap with shitake mushrooms, smoked salmon cucumber boats, wild mushroom ristotto and potato leek with crème fraiche. Chapman's also provides the Jewish standards, taking old recipes and updating them.

Chapman's Specialty Foods provides all the ingredients for your catering needs.

For more information, contact Steve Resnick at 416-444-4477, e-mail steve@chapmans-food.com or visit their website at www.chapmans-foods.com.

Whether it's takeout for 10 or dinner for 1,000, Vaughan, Ont., is the place to find the city's newest kosher caterers. They may be new, but both have longtime catering professionals at the helm.

At Royal Affair Kosher Catering (905-265-8100, ext. 24; http://royalaffair.ca), Meir Osipov offers more than 20 years' experience. "My name's been around the city for so long, people know what kind of function I provide," he says.

He's happy to have been chosen as the exclusive in-house kosher caterer at La Primavera Hospitality & Convention Centre in Vaughan, known for its lush gardens. "People are very excited to see the garden," he says. Plans are in the works to expand the 300- to 350-person outdoor area to accommodate even more guests.

La Primavera may seem dauntingly large, but Osipov says the venue, which seats up to 1,000, can be divided into four separate rooms, making the most of the space. "The two rooms closest to the garden [may] be set up for dinner," with another set aside for the ceremony, or any other function, like a chossen's tish (groom's table) or kabbalas panim (area to greet the groom or bride).

Osipov works hard to find ways, large and small, to upgrade the dining experience – at no extra charge – like skipping ho-hum china for rectangular glass plates. "It looks like crystal. Meals look beautiful on that plate."

Saving the rental cost of premium plates is just one way Osipov puts clients' needs first. "If there's anything we can help them with, we do… If the client says, 'Our budget is X,' we will work hard to include everything… to make sure it's top of the line."

Beautiful plates won't help if the food isn't extraordinary. Like Osipov's take on mushroom crepes, which he calls a Beggar's Purse. "It looks like a rose. When you serve it on that signature plate, it looks beautiful," he says.

Then, there's the new antipasto bar, Royal Affair's answer to those looking for something more than just a food station. It's an appetizer centrepiece at the heart of the dance floor. "Sushi, Montreal-style corned beef, Israeli – just name it, put out the antipasto bar and let people enjoy themselves." Selections are replenished with fresh, hot food as needed.

A unique specialty is fresh, hot barbecue, featuring lamb, chicken or beef, grilled outdoors on a huge stainless-steel barbecue. "It's really hot, really delicious," Osipov says. Year-round? You bet: a canopy over the barbecue means the show can go on even in the worst weather.

His goal: "We'd like to… be the best in this industry." To Osipov, that also means service; he personally supervises every simchah. "I'm not leaving the facility until the last client leaves the facility," he says.

But you don't have to be making a huge event to offer guests delicious fresh food. At Glatt Kosher Centre (905-597-7571), in the Promenade plaza on Bathurst Street between Clark Avenue and Centre Street, partners Prosper Lugassy and Anat Porges pride themselves on creating wonderful food that will make any occasion a special one – in any venue.

Known to locals for her 15 years at Perl's (which was located in the same plaza), Porges says she's already hearing delighted feedback from clients, both about the food and about the service she provides. "I'm very honest with the customer," she says.

That extends to her recipes, which focus on healthy foods and avoid excessive oil and preservatives. "It's very fresh. Everything's done from scratch," Porges adds.

She's anticipating a rush of orders in time for Chanukah. Glatt Kosher Centre can deliver a one-stop, full-service menu for any party: home, office or any social group or synagogue. "We can provide a sandwich platter, or cold-cuts platter, with nice sufganiyot [jelly donuts] and homemade latkes. They're very good latkes," Porges says.

For hosting Shabbat meals in shul or at home, you can be sure of a full, traditional spread from sunset to sunset.

Friday night might begin with one of several homemade soup choices and feature barbecue chicken, kugel, and perhaps even the caterer's signature egg rolls, which are stuffed not with cabbage but a savoury mixture of fresh vegetables.

The next day, a kiddush luncheon could include cholent, different types of kugel, salads and schmaltz herring. Both vegetarian and meat cholent are available.

For any occasion, there's a variety of Chinese food, along with several types of fish. "The fillet of sole… everyone loves it." One trademark dish that repeat clients rave about is the fresh smoked carved turkey, which was popular over Rosh Hashanah. "It's a beautiful presentation, sliced and decorated," Porges says.

While Glatt Kosher Centre is essentially poised as a takeout venue for individuals or groups hosting their own event, she says delivery is available on special, larger orders.

Whether it's for Sheva Brachot or for other family event or business catering needs, she's just glad to be back again serving customers she knew well. "Everybody knows me from Perl's," Porges says. And they're all thrilled to once again have excellent kosher catering available once again in such a convenient one-stop location.

Rosewater has something for everyone

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

The Rosewater, located at 19 Toronto St. in Toronto, has a casual elegance that offers many options for weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, engagement dinners and corporate functions.

From the intimate setting of the upper mezzanine level, which seats up to 60 guests and overlooks the main dining room, to the self-contained supper club on the lower level, the building lends an air of romance and casual decadence to any event.

Rosewater's main dining room is a 100-seat space which is also ideal for a 300-person cocktail reception. Their main boardroom is ideal for private dining and can seat up to 16 guests, and the supper club can host a cocktail reception for 150 people or a banquet-style function for up to 80 guests.

The Rosewater's decor is elegant yet casual. The flexibility of the venue lends itself to cater to the vision of any party host. Require a dance floor? There is room to create one. The venue is also able to accommodate a variety of age groups, from a bar or bat mitzvah to a wedding ceremony and reception.

The Rosewater has hosted a number of wedding parties, especially in their Rosewater Room, located directly above the restaurant.

The Rosewater has played host to many different events, including film festival events, clothing launches and fashion shows.

The Rosewater is one of many venues owned and operated by the Liberty Group. It is an elegant facility in a prime downtown location which attracts clients from the financial and entertainment districts surrounding the venue. However, the clientele at Rosewater vary greatly from one event to another and events are booked by people from across the GTA.

Although Rosewater does not have a kosher kitchen, they are happy to order in a kosher meal for any event. If your event does not require a kosher menu, the Rosewater provides an eclectic menu for any host to choose from. The lunch menu includes such sumptuous items as mini sirloin burgers with roasted portobello, cambozola and truffle aioli and country style frites; tagliatelle with forest mushrooms, young spinach, gorgonzola crumble and pesto cream and a range of desserts including classic vanilla bean crème brûlée with earl grey scented ice cream and Scottish oat cake.

If dinner is what you are looking for, Rosewater's signature dish is their rack of lamb with Yukon potato crisp, rosemary braised tomato and ancient grain mustard jus. Other items to tempt your palate are Rosewater's New York striploin with herb and sea salt roast fingerlings; artichoke and asparagus sauté with merlot jus and beef tenderloin with a porcini and three onion tart. For dessert, there is the tantalizing brioche French toast filled with banana hazelnut cream, fresh mascarpone and peanut butter toffee.

Contact Jeannie Desroches for inquiries or to book your event at jeannie.desroches@libertygroup.com or 416-214-5888, or visit Rosewater's website at www.libertygroup.com.

Footwear retailers combine fun and fashion

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

As any clever shopper knows, you can never have too many pairs of shoes. Whether you are stepping out for a night on the town or simply kicking back at the coffee shop, what you've got on your feet is one of your best assets.

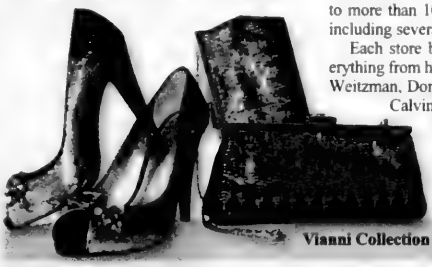
Proving that fashion and function can work together, Naot Canada has been spreading comfortable, stylish shoes across the country since 1990. Originally founded by Corinne Lissoos and Sandy Galet, the company became a Lissoos family business when Galet retired in 2002.

As well as distributing the Israeli-made shoes nationwide, the company also boasts four Naot-only store locations, including Prairie Dog (416-783-4596), located at 960 Eglinton Ave. W., and Naot Footwear (416-496-9116), located at 5891 Leslie St., as well as locations in Montreal and Calgary.

While the Lissoos family have been expanding the exposure of Naot across the country, the shoes themselves have taken quite the journey from their original incarnation. First made in 1942 by the kibbutzniksof Kibbutz Naot Mordechai in the north of Israel, Naots were made with comfort, practicality and durability in mind.

Today, Naots are rooted in those core values but have been transformed into fashionable, stylish creations with loads of colour and fun. "The uniqueness of the country continuously adds the soul to Naot," Lissoos said.

Naots aren't just for summer anymore either. They can carry you through the summer and winter months with ease, boasting a vast selection of dressy, casual, heeled and flat boots, shoes, clogs and, of course, sandals. What's more, the majority of Naots are built with a removable cork footbed, which can either act as the central support system for the shoe or be removed in place of an orthotic or walking aid.



Vianni Collection shoes from Sterling.

"For 2010, we are presenting a new pump line with removable footbeds, which is for orthotic wearers who want to have the option to dress up."

This year, the brand ventured into creating a line of eco-friendly shoes, which are made of recyclable and vegetable-dyed materials.

"Naot is a brand in constant motion, and we try very hard to address the needs of our customers," said Lissoos. "As part of our environmental commitment, we've struck a partnership with Tree Canada, and for every pair of Earth Friendly shoes purchased we will plant a tree on behalf of the purchaser.

"When you spend time at our stores, what you get is a completely unique shopping experience where we focus on each and every foot need. We want our customers to be welcomed and valued," said Lissoos. "We want all 'Naotics' to have happy and healthy feet!"

Another of Canada's leading footwear retailers is Sterling Shoes, which offers an extensive selection of beautiful private label and brand name shoes through six chain stores, including Sterling, Joneve, Shoe Warehouse, Freedman Shoes, Gia and Sterling Outlet. Sterling started out with five locations in 1987 and has since expanded to more than 100 stores across the country, including several in the Toronto area.

Each store brand is unique, offering everything from high-end brands such as Stuart Weitzman, Donald J. Pliner, Cole Haan and Calvin Klein at Freedman Shoes to budget-friendly footwear at Shoe Warehouse, the most recent of which was opened in Thornhill on Centre Street.

While each store is different, Fall 2009 trends remain strong across the board. "The chic studded rocker look with leather, studs, buckles and exposed zippers is huge right now," says Colin Romain, vice-president of operations. "It brings that edginess to our wardrobe that we all crave." Romain cites knee-high boots and colourful tartan, Buffalo check and animal prints as other major trends for the season.

As well, the colour wheel is remaining on purple for the second season in a row, with berry tones establishing themselves as the colour of choice for shoes and accessories. "When choosing shoes for special events, look out for sequins, satin, glitter and metallics to make an eye catching statement," Romain said.

Whether you are shopping in the Sterling boutiques or warehouses, each store balances style, selection and service with ease.

"We want our customers to feel comfortable with us," said Romain. "Creating an enjoyable shopping experience is what we strive for above all else."

For more information on each store, visit www.sterlingshoes.com, www.shoewarehouse.ca, www.joneve.com and www.freedmanshoes.com.

Video a great way to preserve memories

By MICHAEL ISENBERG
Special to The CJN

When you want to preserve memories from simchahs, pictures are great, but they only capture a second of the essence of the event, says videographer Paul Laszlo. Videos, on the other hand, allow you to relive the memories with each viewing of the tape.

"We capture the dancing, the music, the speeches and the hidden moments not seen by others at the event," Laszlo said. "We capture it all."

Laszlo, along with his twin brother Andrew, started Twins Photo and Video (905-707-2385; twinsphotoandvideo@rogers.com) almost 35 years ago. They offer both photography and video, but Laszlo said it's the latter that people are really drawn to, mainly because it's "real."

"Photos are frozen moments in time," Laszlo said. "There's nothing wrong with that, but video is live. It's more engaging for family and friends.

"And think of the benefits. If a relative or friend misses the simchah, you can show it to them via tape."

Twins Photo and Video caters to all types of simchahs and events. But more than its flexibility, its years of experience have taught them how best to serve customers.

"We build up a trust with our customers," Laszlo said. "We get to know the immediate family and sometimes distant relatives and friends, in order to know exactly what they want in their video and how best to film."

Laszlo has filming down to a science. He charts the table setting and all the guests to know who's sitting where. By keeping tabs on everyone, the brothers know which people and tables have yet to be filmed, or how often they're filmed.

And by first talking to the hosts and planners of the simchah, the brothers know which people to focus more attention on.

"Usually the immediate family, but it all depends on the request of the hosts," Laszlo said. "We're doing this for them. It's what they want."

Andy Koltai, of Rafael Studios (905-763-1584; andyvideo_2000@yahoo.com) has also been in the business long enough to have his own unique and successful approach as a videographer.

Koltai uses a monopod. Its small size makes for easy manoeuverability. Koltai says this makes for a more realistic experience as the camera can be brought right into the horah and onto the dance floor, and is not merely someone filming from afar. And with the monopod, there are no wires on the floor, so there is no impediment to guests moving around the hall and dancing naturally.

Koltai also has a strong knowledge of simchahs and events for various religious observances so he knows who, when and how to film at any point.

He does not book more than one event on the same day, even if they are hours apart. Instead he focuses his attention on the host family and its needs for the special day.

"Customers go away with a product that they say is real," says Koltai. "They don't just re-see the event, but it's like they're doing it all over.

"If pictures are worth a thousand words, then video, capturing every second is priceless."

To make for the best possible product, Koltai does all the filming himself to ensure the video is exactly what the customers envisioned, and because he says that the product is all about who is behind the camera.

He is also the one who communicates with customers before and on the day of the simchah.

In his 20-plus years as a videographer, Koltai has gained noteworthy credentials. He helped with the filming of a Steven Spielberg documentary, Survivors of the Shoah: Visual History Foundation, in 2004 and received a letter of recognition from Spielberg for his work.

But despite the praise from a world-class director, for Koltai, filming an event after getting to know a family and seeing its joy at the simchah is what makes his job worthwhile and why he ensures his customers get nothing but the best product.

Simchah music: sending them home humming

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

Many elements go into a simchah, but only music has the power to create a mood, entertaining guests while drawing them in, sending them home humming. Two Toronto bands prove that when it comes to simchah music, there are great choices out there.

The Marc Enkin Band (416-763-3516; www.marcenkinmusic.com) has been playing simchas for more than 20 years, but don't assume their repertoire is dated. "We do some traditional Jewish music, horahs, some klezmer songs, some jazz songs, pop songs."

Names such as Taylor Swift and Jason Mraz might not have come up 20 or even 10 years ago, but, these days, that's what kids want to hear – and Enkin is happy to oblige.

"It's a challenge, meeting the needs of different age groups," he says, but "we're event-friendly, very professional," and he credits his fellow band members with being "really versatile musicians. We play a variety of different music."

When you just want to keep the party going, they'll even play a pre-planned medley: show tunes, Jewish music, you name it. Their Fiddler on the Roof medley is particularly popular.

Special requests can also help make the music an even more significant part of a special day. Whether it's a favourite anniversary song, a first dance, or a classic Israeli favourite, band members – "professional musicians with a really friendly attitude and approach," Enkin says – will work hard to make clients' dreams a reality.

Myra Ehrman wanted to include her fiancé's daughter, who had had vocal training, in her wedding music. "We asked Marc if he would do a bit of rehearsing with her." She says Enkin went above and beyond, holding extra rehearsals just to make sure that everybody was comfortable. "They did a lovely job," Ehrman says. "People were very, very touched."

Beyond the Pale

Ehrman was also particularly impressed that Enkin's band "played in such a way that people heard them, but they weren't overwhelming."

Striking the perfect balance between background music and a fun, crowd-pleasing performance is essential. That's why the configuration of the band can be changed to meet clients' needs. "We tailor make it to suit the event," says Enkin.

Another Toronto band, Beyond the Pale (416-651-9900; www.beyondthepale.net), brings hard-core klezmer and Ashkenazi musical influences to any simchah, even while that's not their primary focus. "We're essentially a concert and touring band," says Eric Stein. "We put out CDs, play music festivals, tour around quite a bit."

With the group's latest CD just released this fall, a recent appearance with Theodore Bikel at Carnegie Hall and a spotlight at the Colorado wedding of TV news personalities Campbell Brown and Dan Senor, Beyond the Pale's star is definitely on the rise.

Yet far from being a step down, ordinary family simchahs are how the band stays in touch with its authentic Jewish roots. "Playing simchahs gives us a really nice environment to play our music in a functional community context," says Stein. "It's not just… people sitting in soft chairs in a theatre – we play great dance music that really gets people fired up. There's a heimishe soul to it."

They'll go to great lengths to create memorable music for a simchah, even when it comes to working within a budget. On a smaller scale, Stein might suggest a jazz trio fronted by another Beyond the Pale member. Scaling upward, the band's violinist is also part of a string quartet, adding the possibility of an entire classical repertoire.

The band's expertise may be mainly eastern European – Stein is artistic director of the Ashkenaz Festival of Jewish music and culture – but band members contribute a diversity of styles ranging from rock and bluegrass to acoustic folk. "We play original stuff, based on traditional styles… we're really, really adventurous, within that," Stein says.

Prospective clients should be familiar with the group's music. Beyond the Pale is happy to honour specific musical requests – "we've played Beatles tunes, Hebrew songs," says Stein – yet the ideal client is one who "really gets" what the band does and seeks their specific creative amalgamation of traditional and contemporary influences.

The band's music is particularly accessible for a mixed crowd, drawing in non-Jewish family members and friends. And, as Stein points out, klezmer was a "fusion" cross-cultural style in the first place.

Repeat business speaks to the band's professionalism. "People enjoy working with us," says Stein. "We get a lot of referrals from… planners who've enjoyed working with us. They feel we bring something unique."

A Judaica store with good selection and prices

By MICHAEL ISENBERG
Special to The CJN

Whether it's shopping for a simchah or finding the perfect gifts for a holiday, all your needs can be found in one place – the Israeli Source.

"Our prices are affordable. We offer a great selection and provide great quality," Israeli Source owner Chuck Elnekave said.

Located at 60 Doncaster Ave., the Israeli Source is unique for its large variety of Judaica offered at more than reasonable rates.

"We show people that you can still have a Judaica store with good service and selection without having to pay exorbitant prices," Elnekave said.

What really distinguishes the Israeli Source from other stores are its sales during the holidays. While most stores have clearance sales after the holidays, the Israeli Source has them before. In this way, Elnekave aims to attract people on all budgets who may not otherwise be able to enjoy festive seasons and simchahs.

With the same end in view, the store does not worry about its interior design, opting to save money on its look and thus be able to keep item prices low.

"We don't attract customers because of our looks, but because of our quality and quantity of products," Elnekave said. "We're a warehouse and buy in bulk, so the more we buy, the less we can sell products for. And the more we sell, the more our prices will come down.

"This is much different from most business. Our priority is to serve the people."

In order to serve the community, the store has gifts for different tastes, and items can be traditional or modern and abstract.

A large selection of gift ideas

For example, there are challah covers and tallitot that are plain white, while others have colourful designs. There are seder plates and menorahs that are basic and virtually unadorned, or you can choose bright colours and different shapes and sizes.

While the Israeli Source always has big sections of all its Judaica,there's a greater emphasis and variety of gifts relating to upcoming holidays.

The store also offers plenty of gift options for children – DVDs, CDs and computer games, or board games, cards and toys. As well, nearly all clothing and accessory products such as kippot, hats and tallitot, come in adult and kid sizes.

As for simchahs, the Israeli Source encourages its customers to visit its new simchah-oriented website simchacentre.com.

"It's the most comprehensive site of its kind," Elnekave said.

The site is user-friendly for quick and easy browsing, making it efficient and effective.

The site is simple to use, as is the store's regular site, israelisource.com, which displays all the store's products online. However, Elnekave says most customers prefer to come in person to the store. And he encourages this, too.

"Many people like to touch and see the products and inquire about them in person," he said. But he also stresses that there's a larger reason why customers prefer to visit the store.

"Our employees," he said. "They're outgoing, helpful people. They're very quick to help come up with gift ideas that suit the people. People are constantly amazed at how efficient our store is, and it's because of our staff."

He also said that because of the employees' ability to connect with customers, people leave after such a pleasant experience and tell their friends about the store. This, he said, is the real secret behind the store's budding success.

"This is Jewish shopping," he said. "Shopping made pleasant, easy and affordable."

Beautiful floral designs with a difference

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

Among the Toronto stores that specialize in beautiful floral designs for your party, there are two that offer some unique features.

Not surprisingly, The Orchids Shoppe specializes in selling a wide variety of popular and specialty orchids. Owner Wonder Chen has been running the shop at its current location at 1202 Yonge St. for the last 10 years. But Chen has more than 30 years experience in business retail and wholesale.

Catering to a clientele of orchid enthusiasts and collectors, Chen offers big orchid arrangements for events, either silk or potted, and son Steve Chen says that The Orchids Shoppe does wonderful centrepieces for weddings and other special events.

Why orchids? Orchids are a unique flower that used to be very hard to find in Toronto. According to Wonder Chen, it's only in the past five years that you have seen more orchids in Toronto. Steve Chen is a third-generation orchid grower, and his family still grows orchids in their native Taiwan.

Wonder Chen says the most popular orchid for weddings is the white orchid known as the phalaenopsis, which is also the most popular type on the market. It is also the most popular orchid used for the Jewish holidays.

Astra Florists Ltd., located at 1778 Eglinton Ave. W., has been serving customers in the same location since 1947. Owner Brian Wayne proudly states that his father, Ed Wayne, started the business, and he believes that Astra Florists was one of the first Jewish florists in the city.

In fact, his father provided the flowers for the first wedding at the Beth Sholom Synagogue when it was still under construction. "When Dad opened up the store, Eglinton was a dirt road, the north end of the city of Toronto," Brian Wayne says.

Brian Wayne has been working at the store since he was 10 years old and has seen his customers increase to include a large corporate clientele. However, Astra still creates beautiful floral designs for weddings and other events through its newest division, Tolyn Designs.

Tolyn Designs joined Astra Florists over three years ago, but Sandra Kaiser and Susan Sottile have both been part of the Astra family for more than 25 years. Tolyn's specialty is weddings, and its aim is to provide brides with an expression of their own style and taste.

Designs by Astra Florists

Sottile believes that "it's our job to help [brides] create the look and feel for this very important day and present them with options that they are comfortable with."

The Orchids Shoppe prides itself on having a lot of items you can't find elsewhere. According to Chen, a lot of flowers shops in the city don't carry enough orchids to make a sufficient number of centrepieces for your average special event. The Orchids Shoppe has 100 square feet full of orchids.

"People come in and are amazed. We carry a lot of orchids people have never seen before." Chen believes they are the only specialized orchid shop left in Toronto.

In terms of parties, The Orchids Shoppe can create a spectacular main piece with many different types of orchids varying in height and colour. Although orchids tend to be more expensive than other flowers, Chen is dedicated to meeting customers' needs and helping them stay within their budget, while at the same time, designing something different and uncommon for their special day.

For more information please contact Steve Chen at 416-961-2639, or e-mail orchidsshoppe@yahoo.com and visit their website at www.orchidsshoppe.ca.

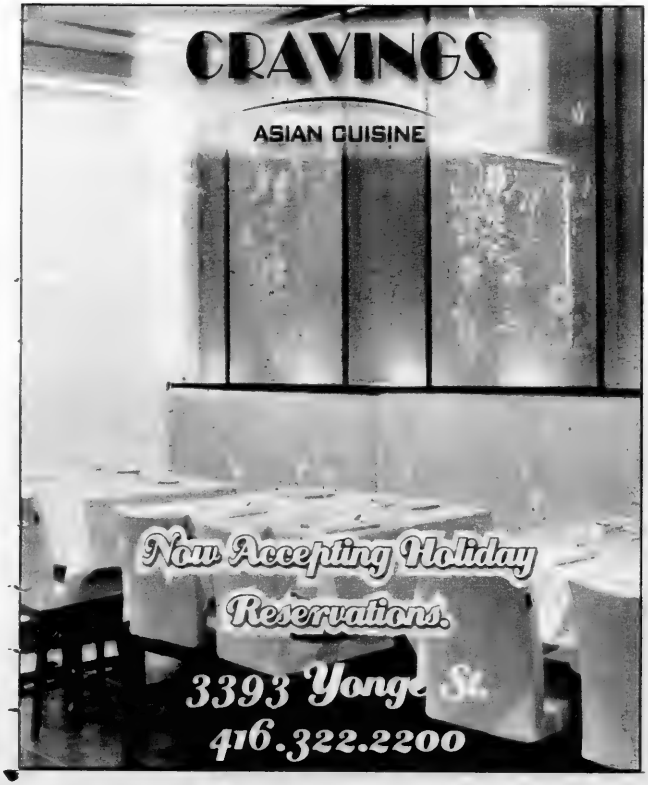
A big trend Sottile at Astra Florists has seen recently in the wedding market is the use of rentals. "People want a big impact on the tables, but are not so concerned with guests taking anything home; it's about the overall appearance of the venues and the wow! effect as the guest enters the room."

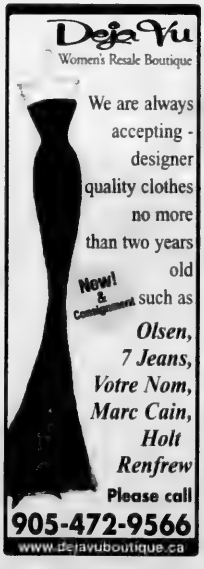
For example, unique vases like oversized martini glasses create a unique centrepiece, but the staff come at the end of the evening to pick up the rentals. This is a cost-effective solution if you are looking for something different but don't want to pay the price for buying all the items involved.

As a full-service florist, Astra offers the convenience of ordering flowers over the phone at 416-787-1415 or via their website at www.astraflorists.com.

If you are particularly interested in floral arrangements for weddings and events, visit the Tolyn Designs website at www.tolyndesigns.com. On the Tolyn website, you will find information about wedding packages and pricing, along with recommendations from former clients. One reads: "Thank you for all the beautiful flowers you created for our wedding day. Everything from the bouquets to the head table decor surpassed our expectations. We would not hesitate to recommend you and wish you the best of luck in the future."

Astra Florists and Tolyn Designs take their many years of experience in the floral business and apply it to today's wedding and event planning market.





Dessert shops offer sweet deals

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

No party is complete without dessert. Almost every guest has a sweet tooth, and will arrive at an event expecting to indulge, whether with cake, cookies or some form of chocolate.

Nancy Burkes of Nancy's Fine Pastries (416-453-6455) says she loves baking as much as others love eating her treats. She has whipped up her recipes for baby showers, engagement parties, birthdays and weddings, as well as supplied products for private catering companies. While her shop isn't kosher, Burkes is famous for her hand-painted cupcakes, cheesecakes, biscotti and pies. Burkes says she is passionate about her work and uses the best ingredients to maintain her reputation for quality.

Nancy Fine Pastries
☒ Not Kosher

Burkes started her at-home business in Thornhill this past month, but has been catering desserts for several years. She graduated eight years ago from George Brown College as a pastry chef and has been in the industry ever since.

While she gets many orders for her customized cupcakes, Burkes says she has no preference in terms of what she most enjoys making.

"I like the designing aspect of being a pastry chef... The decorations are the fun and creative part. Anything from a rolled fondant, which is often done on wedding cakes, to making a little baby in a carriage for a baby shower," she says.

"My decorations are based on the theme of the party. For a wedding, I am often asked to write the names of the bride and groom on the cake. For other parties, they are designs that I call eye candy."

Burkes says she prepares a variety of cakes in her kitchen, including chocolate, vanilla, carrot, mocha and lemon. Her most popular cheesecakes are caramel apple, strawberry, hazelnut, blueberry and white chocolate, and two of her favourite biscotti flavours are chocolate cranberry and almond cinnamon.

Her largest order so far has been 700 hand-painted cupcakes, but Burkes says there are no limits to what people can request.

She does, however, appreciate when clients contact her at least one to two weeks in advance. She says she will often meet with customers in person and has only received positive feedback.

"Clients have been kind enough to call me after the party to tell me how much they enjoyed the product, and that is really the nicest compliment I can receive," she says. "I take pleasure in seeing and knowing that people enjoy the desserts I bake."

Also in the business of catering for happy occasions and life-cycle events is Bev Kruger of The Chocolate Moose (416-784-9092). Kruger has been crafting chocolates by hand in her North York store, which is strictly kosher, for the past 11 years.

Kruger's creations are dairy or parve, and range from nougats, brittles and nuts to chocolate-covered marshmallows. Her delectable truffles come in an assortment of flavours, including amaretto, rum, honey almond, caramel, coffee and mocha. She says she is especially busy around the Jewish holidays, but also receives orders for weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs.

For larger events, Kruger says she is often asked to supply smash cakes and chocolate fountains, made from fine, imported Belgian chocolate.

Two Moms not just for kids

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

On a Friday afternoon, Two Moms Baked Goods (416-783-7200), a nut-free kosher dessert company at 3323 Bathurst St., is bustling. People are picking up the bakery's signature stuffed dessert challahs for Shabbat while others are there for novelty birthday cake orders and packaged brownies and blondies.

At the central work station two large chocolate birthday cakes are being decorated, while some deep purple iced cupcakes are being packed for delivery. The last vestiges of pareve goodies are also still in the pans – coffee cake, chocolate brownies, ginger cookies and lemon squares. Samples of them are offered to this reporter, who has resolved to take just a small bite of each. By the end of the interview only crumbs remain.

The bakery, which has a staff of six, produces custom bar and bat mitzvah and weddings cakes. It is also known for SafeSnacks, its line of nut-free kosher healthy treats.

In addition to its retail baked goods, the work room of the bakery also doubles as a party centre where groups of children bake and decorate treats. When the baking is complete, they head into a large party room for pizza and cake.

The parties suit children from 18 months to 15 years of age says Caroline Davis, owner of Two Moms Baked Goods. "The children get to walk out with whatever they produce. They are very proud of what they make. We can accommodate up to 25 children.

"This [setting] affords them the opportunity to try this craft safely. They can experiment and taste what they make."

The birthday parties are an extension of the parties Davis ran in private homes and the baking classes she teaches after school. "Three years ago, I was coming to people's houses instead of them coming to me."

Davis started Two Moms Baked Goods four years ago with another mother, but today she is the sole proprietor. Originally their goal was to produce healthy, kosher nut-free snacks for children. "I didn't want to send junkie pre-packaged treats to school. Our original nut-free cookie called SafeSnacks is 130 calories with 3 grams of fibre.

"It's a packaged nut-free product, so we can avoid cross contamination. It's totally safe because it's packaged on site."

The cookies – they come individually packaged or in packs of 10– are available in six flavours that include chocolate chip, double chocolate chip and oatmeal raisin.

Davis has also expanded the nut-free kosher product line, which now includes dairy or pareve brownies, blondies and lemon squares.

The products can be found at such retail outlets as Nortown, Bruno's and Pusateri's and they are also sold at Two Moms Baked Goods store at Bathurst and Fairlawn.

Davis, a single mother of three, says the business is ideally suited to the demands of raising her young family. "It affords me the flexibility I need."

She says she juggles the business with carpool and after school activities. She has seven-year-old twins and a five-year-old, all of whom attend Bialik Hebrew Day School. On this Friday afternoon, her seven-year-old son, Justin Tanenbaum, is spending his day off helping out in the bakery. He is happily hosing down pans at a corner sink.

Davis, a Montreal native, says the baking business was a natural progression because she comes from a long line of bakers. "My 99-year-old grandmother (Fay Singerman) is still baking."

Her business is the sole occupant of the premises on Bathurst Street so that she can guarantee a nut-free environment and kashrut. "All the SafeSnacks packaged goods have a nut-free and COR label."

Today the company offers 25 products. The dessert challahs, which are stuffed with apple, cinnamon or chocolate, were introduced in July. They fly off the shelf on erev Shabbat, says Davis. "They're phenomenal. We can't keep them in stock. People call in advance to reserve them."

Chocolates, pastries and special treats for dessert

"The smash cake trend started quite a few years ago. It's a hollow chocolate shell that is personalized and themed. The bar or bat mitzvah boy or girl smashes it, and all of their friends rush to grab a piece."

Kruger says people can spend up to $800 on a smash cake, although they usually range from $100 to $600 depending on the size and details. The chocolate fountain costs $400 for the machine rental, plus $1 for every guest at the party.

For smaller affairs, Kruger says she prepares baskets or glassware filled with chocolates, brittles, or biscotti. She prefers when clients order two weeks in advance, but says she will try to accommodate everyone.

"We do our best not to turn anyone away, even if they order last minute. Instead, we just stress ourselves out."

With over a decade of experience, Kruger says she rarely encounters a person who does not have a soft spot for chocolate.

"All normal people like chocolate. It's the kind of gift you can give to someone who has everything," she says.

"If a person's very wealthy, you're not going to buy them another piece of silver. They already have enough of that. If you're going to a dinner, chocolate always hits the mark. You can never have too much chocolate."

Giant Screen Systems always there for clients

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

With 26 years of experience as a leading supplier of audiovisual equipment, Giant Screen Systems is a great place to go for all your audiovisual rental needs – at a reasonable price.

"[Our prices] are 60 to 70 per cent less than some of our competitors," said Saul Keshen, the president of Giant Screen Systems.

Just some of the myriad of products Giant Screen rents out include plasma flat screen TVs, sound equipment, DVD players and video cameras. They will also have someone go to your bar or bat mitzvah, wedding or corporate event to deliver the equipment, set everything up, pick it up afterwards and operate the equipment, if requested.

Over the past 26 years, Keshen has relied mainly on word of mouth to inform people about the business.

"We don't spend a lot on advertising," he said. With a more than 98 per cent approval rating from clients, he doesn't have to.

Giant Screen Systems is able to work with almost any budget.

"There's a wide range of products," Keshen said. "Even the least expensive one is quite good.

"We make sure that we have the latest, newest, most up to date, highest quality equipment," he added.

Giant Screen rents out equipment from Sharp, Yamaha and Sony, among other well-known brands.

With video/computer monitors starting from as little as $30 a day, having that extra something special at your event doesn't have to cost a fortune.

In addition to rentals, Giant Screen also sells many audiovisual products, again at reasonable prices.

Giant Screen is available to deliver and set up equipent at any time.

"We're there 24/7," Keshen said.

For more information on Giant Screen Systems, or to use their services for your next event, give them a call at 416-784-4454 or visit their website, www.giantscreensystems.com.

Party store packed with products

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

If fair prices, a lot of inventory and knowledgeable staff are what you're looking for in a party supply store, then Party Supply Depot, located at 92 Doncaster Ave. in Thornhill, is the perfect place to find just that.

The 12,000-square-foot store is stocked with everything a person needs for their event.

"We cater for every season, every Jewish holiday, every non-Jewish holiday," said Mel Grevler, owner of Party Supply Depot. "We have lots of product for everybody.

"We've got our finger on the pulse – we know exactly what we need to have and we try to have it. We usually bring in new product long before anyone else finds it."

Party Supply Depot has been around for 20 years. Shoppers come from all over Southern Ontario, Grevler said, because of their reputation for having a lot of inventory at a price that won't break the bank.

"We were the original discounters… there's nobody who's cheaper than us. We originally started as discounters, and we've continued that trend all the way through."

In addition to selling a wide variety of paper and plastic goods, loot bag and give-away items, Party Supply Depot does a lot of balloon decorating, and will go to where an event is being held to set everything up.

The staff at Party Supply Depot is very well trained, and have been working there for a long time, Grevler said.

"Our customers feel like they're part of the family because they come in very frequently and see the same people helping them."

Due to the downturn in the economy, Grevler said he's noticed a lot of people are being much more careful with how they spend their money when it comes to planning bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings. He mentioned that some customers have been buying disposable tableware, adding that, for bar and bat mitzvahs, money is still being spent on giveaways.

The large size of the store means they always have ample product on hand.

"We have enough inventory that if you're having a party for 50 or 5,000 people, we can accommodate that," Grevler said.

"I would tell [prospective customers] that we've got the widest range, the hugest selection, very deep inventories, experienced staff and lots of parking. Our prices are fair. We've been here for 20 years."

Website makes event planning a stress-free affair

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

So you're having a simchah and it's planning time. You're thinking you'll be shlepping here and there to see venues. And of course you're going have to listen to some entertainers to decide on the music. They usually invite you to their events to catch their act. And that of course means more shlepping.

Well, now there's a shlep-free service that will provide you with all the resources needed to plan your simchah. EventSource.ca is a website offering hundreds of venue listings for corporate parties and simchahs, party planners, bands, DJs, videographers, caterers and the like.

The site provides virtual online venue tours and you can actually hear live performances of bands.

"The site is ideal for anyone planning an event," says Jonathan Fruitman, founder of the site. "We have over 250 of the city's top venues and the list is constantly growing."

He says the site was previously known as VenueSource, but when the service was expanded to include entertainment, party and event planners, party decorators, florists, photographers, videographers and caterers, the site's name was changed to reflect the wider range of services featured.

"Lets say you're looking to find a live band. You can listen to an audio clip. If you're looking for a videographer you can find a video clip. If you're looking for a photographer you can check out samples of their work on their [online] photo gallery.

"You can contact them through the site and request a quote or a meeting."

Fruitman says visitors to the site can get multiple vendor quotes for a comparison of services and fees.

"For example, if you're looking for a party decorator or a florist, just hit the button to see the various creative styles of the companies that are listed.

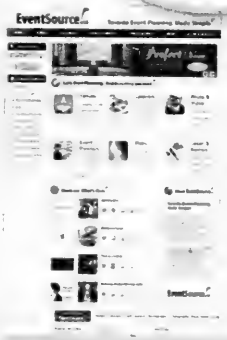
"The beauty of EventSource is that you get to compare 10 florists all from one website. It saves you the hassle of meeting 10 different florists if you like the work of three."

Fruitman got his start in the event planning business when he was working in the computer industry. He branched out into designing websites. As it turned out, many of his clients were people in the events industry.

Six years ago he set up VenueSource. ca, a site that offered virtual tours of various local venues. "Event planners found taking virtual tours of venues with clients very useful.

"With EventSource we have expanded on the success of VenueSource and we've made it just as easy to find other event services as well.

"The site is now a one-stop shop. It has grown to become Toronto's most popular event planning resource."



An ideal site when planning an event.

Kosher venues work hard to please you

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

If you're hosting a simchah, the only surprise you want for your guests is that everything turns out to be wonderful: the atmosphere, the service, the food. Two upscale kosher venues, one large and one small, are working hard to pleasantly surprise you with just how perfect a kosher event can be.

Joseph Rutman, one of six partners who have recently opened the new 398 West on Eglinton Avenue West (416-544-8600; www.398west.ca), shocked even himself by winding up in the restaurant business.

Looking for a kosher spot to take his clients where they could enjoy food and service comparable to the best of non-kosher cuisine, he found a void. "We have a lot of amazing caterers in this city, but there wasn't really a nice place to have a little privacy, have a great meal," Rutman says.

398 West

When the former Gladstone's site became available, the partners saw it at first as a turnkey operation. Yet they ended up renovating extensively, improving lighting and more. "We upgraded all the dishes and cutlery, the crystal." They also beefed up the kitchen capacity to handle 200 or more.

Beyond dietary restrictions on types of meat and fish, there's little holding back this fine-dining establishment — that just happens to serve kosher food. Partner Aaron Mandelbaum says incredulous patrons have asked him, "That's what kosher tastes like? I never knew kosher meat was better meat."

Mandelbaum and Rutman credit the food to Chef Mitchell Lipperman, who's been in the industry for about 20 years, working under local chefs George McNeill at the Royal York and Brad Long at the Air Canada Centre.

As restaurant novices, the partners hired seasoned professionals, including a general manager previously from Sassafraz in Yorkville who's also a professional sommelier and a hostess who brings her many years' experience at Ancaster's The Old Mill. "We have an amazing staff," Rutman says.

398 West became a celeb-viewing hotspot during fall's Toronto Film Festival, drawing film and sports personalities with its Delmonico Steak Special and chocolate fondue featuring handcrafted marshmallows. "Nothing is prepackaged," says Rutman. "Virtually every item is made from scratch in-house," emphasizing fresh, local and seasonal foods.

The Venetian

- [X] Over 300

From intimate family dinners to 35-person corporate events in the private, high-tech conference room upstairs to parties for up to 275, Rutman's loving the business of serving "above the rim" food in a one-of-a-kind atmosphere.

"Nobody's come to us and hasn't been blown away by the venue."

You'll find the same emphasis on fine dining in a magnificent setting on a larger scale at The Venetian Banquet and Hospitality Centre (905-660-1110; www.thevenetian.ca) in Vaughan.

With its on-site kosher kitchen, The Venetian offers a choice of two kosher caterers, Zuchter Berk and L'Echaim, each with decades of experience pleasing palates within the Jewish community.

Director of Operations John Memmo himself brought his two decades serving a largely Jewish clientele with the Richmond Hill Country Club, Copper Creek Golf Club and other venues when he came to The Venetian shortly after its opening. This has made him fluent in meeting hosts' needs. "I am now doing some of the kosher weddings... of people that I bar and bat mitzvahed many, many years ago," he says.

The Venetian believes that offering a kosher meal adds meaning to any Jewish celebration, making "the celebration a statement that it is more than just a party; it gives it Jewish significance."

Desserts for your Chanukah celebration

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

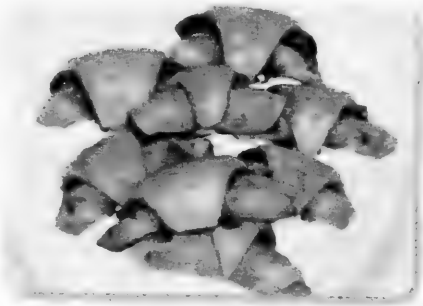
As the noted comedienne, Jackie Mason, is famous for saying, "But we haven't had cake!!!", I add, "What's a celebration without dessert"? As we gather our friends and family around for Chanukah, our meals would be woefully upended affairs without the appearance of some delectable treats with which to end the feast. These sublime recipes accomplish the feat with flair. They're delicious, and will be hits not only at Chanukah, but pretty well the rest of the year as well.

CHERRY AND HAZELNUT RUGELACH

8 oz cream cheese, softened
8 oz unsalted butter, softened
1/4 cup granulated sugar
1/4 tsp salt
1 tsp vanilla
2 cups all-purpose flour

Filling:
1/3 cup granulated sugar
1/4 cup packed light brown sugar
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1 cup chopped toasted hazelnuts
1 cup cherry jam

Topping:
1 egg, lightly beaten
1/4 cup granulated sugar



In bowl of electric mixer using paddle attachment cream together cream cheese and butter until light and aerated. Beat in sugar and salt. Beat in vanilla. Using wooden spoon, gradually stir in flour until just combined and dough is formed. On lightly floured surface, knead dough very gently into a ball. Cut ball into quarters. Wrap each quarter in plastic wrap; refrigerate for 1 hour.

Filling: Mix together granulated and brown sugars, cinnamon and hazelnuts.

On floured surface, roll 1 ball of dough into a 10-in. circle. Spread 1/4 cup of jam over surface; sprinkle with 1/4 cup of the filling. Cut circle into 12 equal wedges. Starting with the wide edge, roll up each wedge. Place cookies, with points tucked underneath, on parchment paper lined cookie sheets. Chill for 30 minutes. Repeat with remaining balls of dough.

Brush tops of each cookie with egg; sprinkle with sugar. Bake in centre of preheated 350F oven for about 20 minutes or until lightly browned. Cool on pan for 5 minutes. Transfer to racks to cool completely. Makes 48 rugelach.

LEMONADE CHIFFON CAKE

2-1/4 cups sifted cake and pastry flour
1-1/2 cups granulated sugar
1 tbsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
1 tbsp. grated lemon rind
1/2 cup vegetable oil
6 egg yolks
1/3 cup freshly squeezed lemon juice
1/4 cup freshly squeezed orange juice
1/4 cup lemonade concentrate, thawed
2 tsp.vanilla
8 egg whites

Glaze:
2/3 cup icing sugar
3 tbsp.lemonade concentrate, thawed

In large bowl, combine flour, 3/4 cup of the sugar, baking powder, salt and lemon rind. Make a well in the centre; add, oil, egg yolks, lemon and orange juices, lemonade concentrate. Using electric beaters or whisk, beat until completely smooth.

Dapper dressing for men of all ages

Paul Spiar, owner of Crawford Boys

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Dapper dressing isn't just for businessmen anymore. Thanks to Crawford Boys (416-782-8137), men of all ages can dress for success — even if that success happens to be in the classroom.

A second generation family-owned business, Crawford has been around since 1952 when it was opened by Mort Spiar as a men's clothing shop in downtown Toronto. After switching hands to Paul Spiar, Mort's son and the current owner, in 1979, Crawford began catering strictly to boys and young men at the urging of clients who wanted them to carry high-quality clothing for their sons.

Now located in Lawrence Plaza (508A Lawrence Ave. W.), Crawford Boys is your one-stop shop for clothing for boys and young men from ages four to 16, carrying everything from fun and casual separates to dress suits and jackets in regular sizes 4 to 22.

The store dedicates 25 per cent of its floor space to sizes 10 to 22. Crawford's extensive collection extends to accessories as well, boasting one of the largest specialty tie selections anywhere.

"Because we are a specialty store, we have the flexibility to offer items that most other stores would not take a chance with," Paul Spiar said. "We are also a single location store, which allows me and my staff to get to know my customers and understand their needs."

Spiar guarantees that shopping at Crawford will be as great for the parents as it is for the boys. As well as its selection of clothing, the store also features hockey memorabilia galore. The walls are covered in signed pictures and Spiar has an extensive collection of hockey cards, most of which are free for the boys to take home with them.

"We make it fun for the kids and we pay close attention to what they ask for as well as their parents, because their opinion is just as important," said Spiar.

"We realize that while Crawford Boys offers one of the largest selections of boys clothing to be found anywhere, it's the personal touch and our willingness to do anything to satisfy our customers that is our best asset."

For Fall 2009, Crawford has injected even more flavour to its clothes with the addition of the funky Buffalo Jeans line to the roster, which includes Ike Behar, Michael Kors, DKNY and Hart Schaffner Marx. Among this seasons' hottest items, Spiar cites wool topcoats and lightweight crushed corduroy jackets as must haves.

"They can be dressed up with a shirt and tie, or worn with a vest and jeans," he said. As an ongoing trend, slimmer cut two and three buttoned single-breasted jackets are extremely popular, as they simultaneously slenderize and elongate any figure.

"Dressing well is not only fun but it adds to your self confidence and self image as well.

"Above all, customer service is of the utmost importance to me," said Spiar.

"It's our customers who constantly come back to shop with us that are our best advertisers. We never forget that."

Chocolate Streusel Squares

In a separate large mixing bowl, beat egg whites until hold soft peaks. Gradually add remaining 3/4 cup sugar and beat until stiff and shiny but still moist. Using spatula, fold one-third of beaten egg whites into flour mixture. Fold in remaining egg whites.

Gently transfer batter to ungreased 10-in. angel food cake pan. Bake in centre of preheated 325 oven for about 50 to 60 minutes or until cake tester inserted in centre comes out clean. Remove from oven and immediately invert pan to cool completely. Run a small paring knife around edge of cake and around "nozzle" to help loosen. Remove from pan and set upright.

Topping: Whisk together icing sugar and lemonade concentrate until smooth and runny. Drizzle over cake. Makes 16 servings.

CHOCOLATE STREUSEL SQUARES

Chocolate Streusel:
1 cup all-purpose flour
1/4 cup granulated sugar
1/4 cup packed light brown sugar
2 tbsp. cocoa powder, sifted
1/4 tsp. each baking powder and salt
1/4 tsp. cinnamon
1/3 cup vegetable oil

Cake:
1-1/4cup all purpose flour
1/4 cup cocoa powder, sifted
3/4 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
3 oz. unsweetened chocolate, coasely chopped
1/3 cup vegetable oil
2 tbsp. unsalted butter or margarine
2 eggs
2/3 cup granulated sugar
1/3 cup packed light brown sugar
1 tsp. vanilla
3/4 cup light sour cream
1/2 cup chocolate chips

Streusel: In bowl, combine flour, granulated and brown sugars, cocoa powder, baking powder, salt and cinnamon. Drizzle oil over, fluffing with a fork until crumbs are formed; set aside.

Cake: In bowl, combine flour, cocoa powder, baking powder and salt.

In small saucepan set over low heat, melt together chocolate, oil and butter.

In bowl of electric mixer, beat eggs until frothy. Gradually add granulated sugar and then brown sugar, beating until light coloured and very thick, about 5 minutes. Beat in vanilla. On low speed, slowly pour in melted chocolate mixture, mixing until thoroughly combined. Using wooden spoon, alternately stir in flour mixture and sour cream, beginning and ending with flour mixture.

Scrape mixture evenly into greased 11x 7-inch baking pan. Sprinkle streusel over. Sprinkle with chocolate chips.

Bake in centre of preheated 350 oven for about 30 minutes or until cake tester inserted in centre comes out clean. Makes 12 servings.

ORANGE CHOCOLATE CHUNK CAKE

3 cups all-purpose flour
1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. baking soda
1/4 tsp. salt
1 cup unsalted butter or margarine, softened
1-3/4 cups granulated sugar
4 eggs
3 tbsp. grated orange rind
3/4 cup yogurt
1/4 cup orange juice
2 tsp. vanilla
2 cups coarsely chopped bittersweet chocolate

Topping:
8 oz. coarsely chopped bittersweet chocolate
3/4 cup whipping cream

In bowl, combine flour, baking powder, baking soda, and salt; set aside. Stir together yogurt, orange juice and vanilla.

In bowl of electric mixer with paddle attachment, cream butter with sugar until well combined. One at a time, beat in eggs, beating well after each addition before adding the next one. Beat in orange rind. Using wooden spoon, alternately stir in flour mixture and yogurt mixture, starting and ending with flour mixture. Stir in chocolate. Scrape into greased 10-in. Bundt pan.

Bake in centre of preheated 350 oven for 45 to 55 minutes or until cake tester inserted in centre comes out clean. Cool cake in pan for 15 minutes. Depan and rest on cooling rack to cool completely.

In small saucepan, bring cream just to a boil. Remove from heat; whisk in chocolate until completely melted. Pour over cooled cake. Makes 16 servings.

The perfect gathering place for friends and family

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

Special occasions deserve special attention to detail. Whether you're staging a birthday gala, anniversary, bar or bat mitzvah or wedding, the venue you choose must be the perfect gathering place for your friends and family.

From banquet halls to hotels to restaurants, there's an endless list to choose from, so to narrow down the options, the following two are worth checking out.

The ballroom at the Novotel

Novotel Toronto North York Hotel

- ☒ Non-Kosher
- ☒ Kosher event catering available
- ☒ Capacity up to 100
- ☒ 100-300 capacity
- ☒ Wheelchair Accessible

For events your guests will always remember, both Oliver & Bonacini Restaurants (www.oliverbonacini.com, 416-364-1211) and Novotel Toronto North York Hotel (416-218-3853) provide memorable culinary experiences and exceptional facility features.

"Restaurants are a great option for party or event venues, as there is so much to offer – with proven service standards, exceptional food quality, existing décor and ambiance," said Deborah Gee, manager of events and private dining at Oliver & Bonacini.

With six restaurants in the Toronto area, Gee said Oliver & Bonacini offers "one-stop shopping" with a centralized events team, so that staff can help clients find their ideal venue with just one phone call. Currently, all of the locations – Canoe Restaurant & Bar, Biff's Bistro & Wine Bar, Jump Café & Bar, Toronto Board of Trade, Auberge du Pommier Restaurant and O&B Café Grill – have either private or semi-private event space, and many of the restaurants are available for full buy-outs on certain days.

Gee said Canoe and Auberge du Pommier are the two most popular choices for events, as both restaurants offer large private dining rooms. Auberge also features a garden terrace that is available for receptions and ceremonies.

Oliver & Bonacini is the exclusive service provider at the Toronto Board of Trade, which has 13 meeting rooms for training sessions or trade shows, which often wrap up with a cocktail reception.

"While we do see a steady stream of corporate dinners and corporate cocktail receptions, we are seeing a major increase in our wedding business, as more clients are opting for the restaurant turnkey approach to their weddings," Gee said. "By choosing a restaurant as a venue, the client can rest assured that there will not be a list of hidden costs for furniture, kitchen equipment, service staff and linens, as most of these requirements are already naturally in place."

Each of the restaurants is beautifully styled before being enhanced with flowers or additional decorations that a client may decide to bring in, Gee said. Depending on the venue and time of year, planning usually takes place a minimum of three weeks in advance of the event date. With weddings and other large-scale events, it is always better to plan within the same season of the event, as the chefs create seasonally inspired menus that change every spring and fall.

Gee said the Oliver & Bonacini event co-ordinator can assist clients in pairing food and beverage selections, recommending suppliers or even working with the company mixologist to create a signature cocktail. In each of the restaurants, the chefs have created group menus to choose from, but are always willing to entertain custom requests and dietary restrictions.

"We often work with Jewish clients and are happy to bring in kosher meals for those guests who request it with advance notice. We can build a menu [with traditional Jewish foods] in any of our restaurants. At the Board of Trade, we are open to requests to bring in a kosher caterer for full venue events," Gee said.

Much like Oliver & Bonacini Restaurants, Novotel Toronto North York Hotel can accommodate a client's every need. Whether it's a small intimate gathering or a grand affair for hundreds, the hotel's team will work together to guarantee the event is unique and successful.

The most common types of parties held at the venue are for social occasions or holidays and wedding celebrations, said Tanya Frattaroli, director of sales and marketing at Novotel Toronto North York Hotel. Depending on the number of guests attending, the hotel has facilities to accommodate eight to 300 people, with a banquet room that seats 220.

The hotel provides set menus to choose from, which typically make the decision process easy, Frattaroli said. However, clients are welcome to customize their own menus or use their own kosher caterer for an additional service fee. Since Novotel North York does not have a kosher kitchen, the company works closely with local kosher caterers, including Dairy Treats, Miami Grill, Menchen's Catering and Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers.

Food spans the range from traditional comfort food to adventurous frontiers, with a pinch of luxury thrown in. Whether it's roast prime rib with peppercorn sauce, Ballotine of Chicken with apricot sauce or an appetizer of stuffed mushroom crepes, Memmo personally ensures a high level of attention to detail, so that everything coming out of the kitchen will delight diners.

With butler service for hors d'oeuvres or stations offering corned beef, sushi, pasta, and – at the other end of the meal – waffles and sundaes to satisfy even the most choosy sweet tooth, The Venetian aims to pamper your guests and make their experience wonderfully memorable, in lush, elegant halls that can accommodate from 120 to 600 people.

On weekdays, flexible spaces can be arranged for the many unique functions of a Jewish wedding, for example kabbalat panim (area to greet the groom or bride), chossen's tish (groom's table) and bedecken. On weekends, more than one event may be held simultaneously, but Memmo ensures that each client receives special attention. "It's not just a room rental for us," he says

Memmo or the Venetian Banquet's owner, Joseph Mete, personally meet with clients and supervise every kosher simchah from start to finish. "We care about the people and our reputation, and ensuring that our caterers are going above and beyond," Memmo says.

Other kosher venues advertising in this supplement are: 398 West, 416-544-8600; Baycrest Hospitality Services, 416-785-2500; Beth Torah Congregation, 416-782-4495; Hamizrach Kosher Restaurant, 416-222-7727; Park Hyatt Toronto, 416-925-1234; Adath Israel Congregation, 416-635-5340.

398 West provides top notch kosher meals.

Sears gift registry service makes giving easy

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

For many couples, registering for gifts can be an overwhelming and often confusing experience. Sears (1-800-211-2111, www.sears.ca) is a great place to go to get help with all your registering needs.

"Registering at Sears is like registering for your total home solution, because of the services that we offer," said Heather Robertson, national gift registry business and marketing manager for Sears. "We have everything from maid service to painting service, [and] everything for indoor and outdoor."

Couples can register by calling the 1-800 number, going online at sears.ca or doing it in the store. Gifts from the registry can be purchased in the same way. Couples can choose their home store to have gifts delivered to or the person buying the gift can deliver it personally.

To help make the registering process easier, every consultant in store has what is called the "Gift Calculator." The Gift Calculator takes the number of people attending your wedding (or shower) and, based on that number, figures out how many items should be registered at varying price points.

"[The Gift Calculator] calculates for the benefit of the guest so they have a wide choice of items to select from and also at the price point that meets their expectations of what they want to spend," Robertson said.

Another tool that Sears gift registry consultants use is called the Room-by-Room Must Haves chart, which lists everything a couple will need in every room of the house, and suggests quantities as well. Sears often sets up several interviews with couples and does the registering process in stages.

"Our consultants are really good at advising and suggesting to couples what they need," Robertson said.

Sears also helps make registering easier by offering the Completion Program, which is applicable to both weddings and showers. The Completion Program is basically a book of coupons that allows couples to purchase any remaining items on their registry list at a discount.

As well, Sears has also started offering a deferred payment program for leftover registry items to make buying those big ticket products easier on the wallet.

PARTY PLANNER

Party consultants are a welcome addition to any event

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

Bridal and party consultant Tamara Temes has been planning events for 13 years. She began her business after she got married because she believed she could identify with brides because of her age and as a result of having just gone through the wedding planning experience with her own consultant.

Her mission was, and still is, to go "above and beyond to make sure that every detail is looked after and… treat each simchah as if it was my own." Temes does not want her clients to feel as though they are one of 1,000 people.

"I really don't take on 1,000 weddings; I spend a lot of time on every bride so she can focus on the details."

Although Temes started her business focusing on weddings, she now consults a lot for bar and bat mitzvahs.

She encourages anyone planning a special event to visit her website at www.tamaratemes.com and to contact her at 905-770-7977 or tamaratemes@rogers.com.

Temes offers a free consultation with prospective clients to discuss their plans and event needs. After a client has booked, she schedules a meeting to go over a detailed wedding checklist including timelines so that she can ensure everything that needs to be booked is done so in a timely manner.

Tamara Temes

In the weeks and months leading up to an event, Temes keeps in touch throughout the planning process. She is readily available to provide advice and attend any meetings. Four to six weeks before the function, she meets with her clients again and goes through a detailed itinerary that is customized to each bride and groom or bar and bat mitzvah boy or girl. She puts together portrait, makeup and hair schedules and is present for rehearsals and, of course, the day of the event.

She also helps with the important details to make a simchah exactly what her clients desire. For example, she recently planned a vegan and eco-friendly wedding. She worked with the bride and groom to plan a vegan meal and find recyclable invitations. For this particular wedding, Temes found someone who could provide eco-friendly invitations and someone else for vegan chocolates for their guests.

Temes' clients praise her for being available to them and for her patience and professionalism.

Former clients Ilan and Cindy write, "We want to thank you so much for the job you did at our wedding. The fact that we could enjoy the evening fully (we did) and it all ran like a well-tuned machine shows that you were working hard behind the scenes… Thank you so much for your part in the best day of our lives, you did a wonderful job!"

Heidi Gruenspan entered the party and event planning business 16 years ago because her sister was getting married. During the planning process, Gruenspan watched her sister's wedding planner then found someone to train her in event planning and the rest, she says, is history. Over the years she has planned a wide variety of simchahs throughout the Greater Toronto Area, specializing in weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs.

Gruenspan believes that wedding planners are there to ensure everything a bride wants for her wedding gets done. She does not believe in taking any kickbacks, and works hard to try to save clients money on their wedding.

Gruenspan believes that "wedding planners are wedding insurance," that she is there to make the necessary phone calls and to troubleshoot. She also believes that event hosts should be guests at their own function and leave all the stress and worrying to her.

Gruenspan offers both a full service and day-of package to her clients. She believes that once a couple gets engaged they should call her right away to set up a consultation. At her consultation, she provides all prospective clients with information including names and numbers of vendors, and she provides this without any obligation to hire her.

Once Gruenspan is hired, she encourages her clients to send her their contracts so that she can keep everything organized. She sees herself as her clients' "planning buddy," as she is there to listen to their ideas for the event and works hard to make their dreams a reality.

Gruenspan also shares some of the greatest trends in event planning and execution with her clients to help them make informed decisions for their special day. For example, candy tables are very popular right now, even in the wedding market. She also sees a lot of beautiful draping of rooms and a trend toward being environmentally friendly. Giveaways for guests are also more usable than they used to be.

For bar and bat mitzvahs, which people book her for two to three years in advance, activities are very popular. Gruenspan is seeing a lot less themed bar and bat mitzvahs, or a trend toward keeping a theme on the kid tables only. She also sees a lot less candlelighting and a lot more tribute videos.

Many of her brides are still in touch, even many years after their wedding. They call when they have babies and keep her informed about their lives. Gilah, a former Gruenspan bride, shared that "working with Heidi keeps your head in the wedding and out of the worrying that can come with holding an event. Her planning experience, along with the help of an assistant, allows brides to stay calm. I would recommend her for anyone planning an event."

For more information please call Heidi Gruenspan at 905-738-5030 or heidig@heidig.ca, or visit her website at www.heidig.ca.

Bellvue Manor does 'full-service planning' for simchahs

Bellvue Manor (905-761-7288, 8030 Jane St. in Vaughan) is the first and last stop you'll need to make in planning your party.

"When someone comes in, they literally do not need to go anywhere else. We do full-service planning," the manager said.

He added that the service includes planning pre-simchah events and day-after brunches. "We take care of people from the moment they leave their house to see us until they go back home after the party.

"We want to ensure that your day is as you dreamed it. A co-ordinator works with clients to design the menu, finalize the floor plan, outline a schedule of on-site events and assist you with other aspects of planning your event," he said.

He said that guests are impressed with Bellvue the first time they visit. "They are welcomed by the lavish luxury of 19-century style architecture, emanating both splendour and grace, taste and timelessness.

"Upon entering the grand foyer, Italian marble and cast limestone walls create the ambience of an estate home and provide the perfect canvas for the most grandiose of events.

"Magnificent custom paintings adorn the grand foyer, and oversized French mahogany doors present lush classical elements blending together romance and elegance."

Bellvue Manor

- [X] Kosher Kitchen Available
- [X] Over 300
- [X] Wheelchair Accessible

He said that the dining room – they have both kosher and non-kosher kitchens – is elegant, with a choice of ivory damask napkins and floor length table linens, and Royal Doulton china.

"Hosts have the option of a fully customized menu based on personal taste and lifestyle, or our executive chef can produce the finest of menus from around the culinary world.

"Our goal is to create a catering masterpiece that will leave a lasting memory for your guests. We pride ourselves on being able to constantly reinvent ourselves based on the needs of each client."

Bar mitzvah in Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Bar mitzvah and wedding tours to Israel and elsewhere are available for every budget and every need, says Michelle Shenkar, office manager of the downtown branch of Payless Travel (416-922-0116).

"Some people want to join other families, some want their own family trip, and others want their wedding trip planned right down to the chupah."

Bar mitzvah tours are popular, she said, because adults and kids are able to celebrate together.

"In addition to the tour and the bar/bat mitzvah ceremony, they have a party, and they receive a present from the rabbi," Shenkar said. "It's really a wonderful experience."

Included in the tour is a jeep ride in the Golan Heights, following the footsteps of Israeli soldiers during the Six Day War; a volunteer morning at a soup kitchen; a visit to Yad Vashem; a trip to Safed, and a trip to the western Galilee to Rosh Hanikra at the northern tip of Israel.

The bar/bat mitzvah celebration in Neot Kdumim includes a tour of the unique artificial reserve, which ties in with the portion of the week, she said. "The reserve's outdoor theatre, seating about 600 people, is the site of the celebration. Kosher, vegetarian or dairy meals are available on request."

Brides and grooms can plan their whole wedding to a destination of their choice, said Shenkar.

"In Israel, we can easily arrange for a rabbi, and we have access to a wedding planner, so the celebration after the chupah will be stress-free."

Those who want an island destination can arrange to travel to one that has an island and a shul, she said. "We can make arrangements for that, and we can recommend spending your honeymoon in the most luxurious all-inclusive resorts in the Caribbean, or suggest an unforgettable romantic adventure in the Far East."

Quasar Mode brings France to Toronto

By RANDI BERGMAN

Whether its feathers, florals or faux furs that grace the runway from one season to the next, what you should always trust is your own sense of personal style. Now take that sense and project it onto the walls of a fun and vibrant boutique in the heart of Yorkville and what you've got is Ginette Beauchamp's business plan for Quasar Mode (416-964-1214), back in 1979.

Celebrating 30 years at 1240 Bay St., Quasar Mode remains one of the leading fashion authorities in the city because of Beauchamp's one-of-a-kind approach to womenswear.

"I opened Quasar Mode with the thought of bringing to Toronto sophisticated collections directly from Paris, and my artistic and French background have always helped me select very distinct and original fashions," says Beauchamp.

Rather than cramming the walls with dress after dress, Beauchamp limits the store's selection to her favourite French designers.

When asked to choose her favourites, Beauchamp is unable to. Rather, she points out what is unique about each collection she carries.

"The collection of Chacok from the south of France is my most colourful and artistic presentation, and Anne Fontaine graces the store with her magnificent white shirts," she says.

"Zapa and Rodika Zanian are both from Paris and offer gorgeous coats, suits and dresses… with an eye for beautiful finish and an original twist."

All designers carried in the store are exclusive to Quasar Mode in Toronto. Unique in most every way, the designs bring a certain freshness to the city that is scarcely seen anywhere else.

"I like to describe my collections as casual chic wearable at the office and yet can fit very well at a cocktail party, adding perhaps a beautiful necklace or stunning earrings to change the mood," says Beauchamp. All with a bit of flavour-induced fun, of course. After all, walking into Quasar Mode is like walking into a bouquet of vibrant flowers.

While being quite different from the rest, Beauchamp understands the need for practicality. "Everything in the store has a bit of an edge, while remaining sophisticated and feminine," says Beauchamp. "I'd never let anyone leave the store with something that didn't suit them."

Quasar Mode offers free alterations on all regularly priced items. "By alterations, we don't just mean shortening a hem," says Beauchamp. "We do everything."

Above all, Beauchamp wants shopping at Quasar Mode to be a fun experience. "Our staff is always making people laugh," she says. "Clothing should never be a matter of pretension. It should enhance your life! It should make you happy!"

Party keepsakes personalize events

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

A creative way for your guests to remember a great event is to provide them with a take home keepsake from the evening.

Eventworks (416-482-3984, 416-993-7241; www.eventworks.ca), provides digital photo novelties that ensure the memories of your special event will last a lifetime. Dynamite Parties and Novelties (905-669-7620; www.dynamiteparties.com) is a one-stop shop for giveaway and customized items.

Started in 2001 by Daniel Malen and Ariel Platt, Eventworks provides its service at weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, birthdays, corporate parties, proms, and many other events.

Platt believes Eventworks is successful because it can be hard to find a novelty keepsake item that appeals to everyone.

"It's hard to find something that works for everyone in all age groups," she said. "Photos are such a great item. It's what people want and what they will keep.

"Adults love it," Platt added. "A lot of parents get just as excited about it as the kids do."

When working with clients, Eventworks will design a free custom border to go around the photos, one that fits with the theme of the event. They also post every photo on their website following the event for people to enjoy and download long after the event has passed.

Photos can come in frames, on magnets, keychains, in a snowglobe, and even on a mousepad. Eventworks also has reasonable prices, Platt said, which appeals to their clients.

"We work with clients to figure out what their budget is in advance, and work with that," she said.

Not only does Eventworks do a lot of weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs, they also work with a lot of companies, including the City of Toronto and TD Bank. They'll also be working with Disney soon, Platt said.

"We're just happy to go wherever people want us."

Dynamite Parties and Novelties was started more than five years ago by Ken Gutman after he imported some novelty items for one of his daughter's parties.

At Dynamite Parties, they are constantly searching throughout North America and the rest of the world for items they can bring into the store, at a reasonable price. They are very flexible and able to work with almost any budget, big or small, Gutman said.

"We tailor the party to [how much] people want to spend. I'll tell people what they'll need, but I don't force it on them."

Just a few of the many items Dynamite Parties has for sale at its Dufferin and Steeles area store are glow necklaces, pillows for Ipods and candy. They also do custom designs as well for everything from kippahs to invitations and place cards to sign boards.

For Gutman, an important part of the Dynamite Parties experience is providing excellent customer service in a friendly, relaxed environment.

"We're always there to help," he said. "Advice is free."

Lingerie an important part of any bride's outfit

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When it comes to weddings, the bride is always centre stage and all eyes are on her for the duration of the festivities.

Most people know there are team of beauty experts who have had a hand in helping the bride look her best on her big day. Once the perfect dress is selected there are fittings with alterationists and numerous consultations with hairdressers, manicurists, and makeup artists.

However, there is a silent member of the bride's beauty team that rarely gets recognition: the undergarment expert.

The staff at Legs Plus and Bra Boutique (416-497-2350), a store specializing in bra and undergarment fittings, work closely with brides, say co-owners Randy Szymkowicz and Rhona Finkelstein. Located at 5867 Leslie Street in the Pickle Barrel Plaza, the shop (www.braboutique.com) carries a wide selection of bras in sizes 30 to 56 with cup sizes in AA to L.

Customers get individual attention from staff who have the expertise and take the time to help women find proper fitting bras, says Finkelstein. "It's about fit, function and comfort. The support comes from the lower band, not from the shoulder strap. That's secondary support.

"You don't want to buy a bra that's too big because the breasts aren't contained properly. If it's too small the straps will dig in and it will be uncomfortable and look unseeming."

She says brides generally choose bustiers or strapless bras, which are paired with a one piece undergarment that "gives a nice smooth shape. You don't want to see lumps."

Finkelstein explains that she sees the dress or gets a good description. "The gown designer will often give instructions for the type of bra that is best suited to the dress.

"My goal is to make sure the bride gets the best fitting bra and the most comfortable undergarment."

The boutique carries a good selection of bras for various evening wear styles, says Szymkowicz. In addition to strapless, they carry bras for backless and low-back dresses.

Shana Tilbrook, co-owner of Tryst, a pair of lingerie shops at 465 Eglinton Ave. W. (416-484-6678) and 559 Queen St. W. (647-430-0994), says the majority of brides often choose one piece control garments that attach to the bustier or strapless bra for a "seamless look." The bra or bustier is fitted and purchased separately, she explains.

However, she notes that the bride will often choose different lingerie for her wedding night because the control body garment is not necessary for after the wedding.

Tryst carries sexy and comfortable sleepwear for brides. "It's beautiful and elegant. There's a lot more variety in bridal-type lingerie."

As for evening wear, Tilbrook notes that there is less emphasis on cleavage. "Cleavage is not as big as in the past. There's more conservative dressing. People are layering clothing more."

Strapless bras are still very popular for special events, she says. "Our best selling strapless bra has a wire for support and a removable strap."

Tilbrook stresses that ultimately the proper fit is the most crucial aspect of purchasing undergarments, which is why she recommends that people buying bras go to specialty lingerie shops like Tryst (www.trystlingerie.com).

She says she and her staff offer the proper fitting expertise and a large selection of bras, mentioning that Tryst carries sizes 28 to 52 in AA to K cups. "We have something for everyone. We have a lot of variety for different shapes of breasts so clients can get fitted with the perfect size bra.

"We carry each bra in one colour. If someone is a 38K we can order the bra in another colour."

The fittings take a half an hour to an hour, Tilbrook says. "It's one-on-one, but it's a two-way conversation. We can tell you what fits and what looks right, but only the customer knows how it feels and their own comfort level."

She says the challenge in finding a perfect fitting bra is accommodating the shape of the breast. "It's not a question of size, it's the shape."

Tilbrook says that she trains all the store staff at Tryst and she has also been chosen by the industry to train other bra-shop owners on how to properly fit a bra. "I have probably trained more women who don't work for me than any other person in Canada.

"The training is ongoing as the industry changes."

She also notes that technological changes means there are more options for large-breasted women like herself. "Five years ago there was no strapless bra to hold my breasts. Now there is one on the market."

Like Tilbrook, Szymkowicz says she and the other fitters at Legs Plus and Bra Boutique take great pride in finding the right bra for their customers. "It's very personalized service. We fit lots of first-time bra wearers and all sizes of women."

She notes that they carry various specialty bras so they can fit people with medical conditions like arthritis, and they also have a large selection of maternity bras for nursing mothers. "One of our most popular nursing bras is a tank top with a built-in bra."

Finkelstein uses the word "haimish" to describe the atmosphere at the store. "People feel very comfortable here."

Since 2003, Legs Plus and Bra Boutique has been sharing retail space with Beachwear Unlimited, the bathing suit store owned by Szymkowicz's mother, Elly Sherman and Marilyn Snider, Finkelstein's mother.

"They have been partners in the bathing suit business for 30 years," says Szymkowicz, recalling that their mothers initially had their own store in the same plaza.

When the retail space next door became vacant back in 1982, the mothers suggested that their daughters get together to run a hosiery business, which they felt would be complementary to the bathing suit store.

"Our mothers grew up together in Toronto," says Szymkowicz. "Our grandparents were friends in Poland before they came to Canada. And now there's a third generation. We have children the same age who have also grown up together."

Tryst is also a family affair. Tilbrook, who has been in the lingerie business since 1997, initially ran a bra boutique in the Annex, which she eventually sold. In 2004 she opened the Eglinton Avenue store with her mother, Louise Sommers. Tilbrook's sister-in-law Anita Owen became a co-partner with the opening of their second store on Queen Street in 2007.

Tilbrook says she has been interested in lingerie since she was 18 years old. "I had large breasts so my mom took me to go get fitted and buy good quality bras.

"But I never liked them. There was not a lot of selection. My original idea was to become a lingerie designer.

"I wanted to help women in all sizes find beautiful bras."

Relais Détente Spa's mission is all about prevention

Spa Life
By KATHRYN KATES

Louise Methot opened the Relais Détente Spa, in the Delta Sherbrooke Hotel and Conference Centre in Sherbrooke, Que., in 1995. Sherbrooke is in the picturesque Eastern Townships.

The spa is located on the hotel's lower level, next to the mini-pool, whirlpool, sauna and exercise room. The cosy spa is decorated in shades of blue and beige. It features 10 treatment rooms, a retail space at the entrance and a lounge area. There are 20 staff members, including estheticians and massage therapists. According to Methot, the spa's clientele is 60 per cent women, with 85 per cent of the spa's patrons coming from the area.

The esthetic products used for services and retailed at the spa include Matis; Mary Cohr and Algologie from France; Marso from Quebec and Gehwol, a foot product from Germany.

Services include facials such as the Marso Treatment, a starting point for identifying specific problems while leaving the skin feeling fresh, smooth and hydrated, and the Mary Cohr's Catio Lift Facial, a treatment that produces an immediate lifting effect through muscular stimulation. Then, a draining stimulation boosts the skin's vital functions, clears toxins from tissues and re-oxygenates the skin.

Body treatments include peelings with a water cascade and wraps, with a choice of peat mud, algae, sea salts, goats' milk or chocolate. Also offered are reflexology leg, foot and hand treatments. Massages on offer are Swedish, the gentle California, Lava Shell, Yoghurt and Honey, and Stone and Rain.

"The most popular package is our half-day package that includes a massage, a therapeutic bath and pressotherapy – a leg treatment that improves the lymphatic system," Methot said.

The mission of the spa is all about prevention, she said. "It is to offer services that release tension and help a person feel better. When you come to our spa, you can get just a massage, but it is more than just going to a clinic for a massage, because we offer many more treatments and our clients can experience a total package, including a massage, along with body and facial treatments."

The newly renovated Delta Sherbrooke has 178 tastefully decorated guest rooms. The hotel is connected to the convention centre and has proven to be a popular choice for the business traveller for 20 years.

The hotel offers a number of packages including the Romance Package, the Shopping Package, the Relaxing Retreat and the Golf & Spa Package, which includes one night's accommodation in a Delta-category room, full American breakfast at Le Murville, one round of golf for one person at one of four area golf courses, and three hours of spa treatments for one.

The Delta also offers train packages with a gourmet meal aboard the Orford Express Tourist Train. A package consists of one night's accommodation in a Delta Room category, full American breakfast at the Delta, and a 3-1/2 hour train ride through the Eastern Townships from Sherbrooke to Eastman, with a stop in the town of Magog. Make sure to say "hi" to the co-owner and conductor of the Orford Express – who also happens to be the priest at the local cathedral. The train ride is a relaxing way to experience the serenity of this area.

Sherbrooke and the Eastern Townships have long been a year-round holiday getaway area for Montrealers and Americans living in the border states of Vermont and New York. Attractions in Sherbrooke include the artistic murals over a four-kilometre stretch of downtown Sherbrooke, just steps away from the Frontenac Street Esplanade. Sherbrooke is chock-full of culture: there is a Museum of Natural Sciences, the Sherbrooke Museum of Fine Arts and so much more. For the more athletically inclined, hikers and bikers can enjoy the Townships Trail, especially beautiful during the summer and fall.

Contact the Relais Détente Spa at 819-569-9097. For hotel reservations, call toll free, 1-800-268-1133 or online: www.deltahotels.com. For information on Sherbrooke, call 1-800-561-8331 or online: www.tourismesherbrooke.com.

Hardline demands block Schalit deal

By TOMER ZARCHIN

JERUSALEM — Hamas is still sparring with Israel over the names of 50 prisoners it wants released in exchange for abducted Israel Defence Forces (IDF) soldier Gilad Schalit, a senior official in the Islamic militant group said on Monday.

The official said Israel is still balking at including prominent political leaders and top Hamas militants it holds.

Last week, Israeli and Hamas officials spoke of progress, raising speculation that an agreement could be finalized within a few days. In Gaza, Hamas' interior minister said he hoped a deal would be reached by the end of the year.

Hamas accused Israel earlier Monday of working to sabotage the prisoner swap deal, saying negotiations were stalled as a result of Israel's continued refusal to accept the group's demands.

Hamas public relations supervisor Osama Hamdan told the Al-Hayyat pan-Arab daily that some people in Israel were seeking to make the deal fail by leaking details of the negotiations, in particular with regard to the release of terrorists with "blood on their hands."

The paper quotes Hamas sources as saying that Israel is still refusing the group's demands to release senior militants Ibrahim Hamad, Abdullah Barghouti and Abbas Asayeb.

According to the report, Israel has not even agreed to bring forward these prisoners' names during negotiations and has rejected Hamas' offers to send them into exile following release.

The News in Brief

Canada

Cotler Tables Bill

OTTAWA — Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler tabled a private member's bill last week that would let Canadian victims of torture, crimes against humanity and genocide sue ex-perpetrators – individuals and countries – in Canadian courts. The Redress for Victims of International Crimes Act would amend the State Immunity Act that protects foreign governments against all but commercial lawsuits in domestic court. Cotler thinks the bill has a good chance of passing because it was co-sponsored by MPs from the three other parties. The 2000 Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes Act allows for criminal, but not civil, prosecution for war crimes committed outside Canada.

Students Give Books

OTTAWA — Grade 6 students from Ottawa's Hillel Academy and the Charles H. Pulse Public School came together Dec. 1 to help a school in Iqaluit replenish a library collection destroyed by fire. Joanie Elementary School, located in the Nunavut capital, burned down a few years ago. It's been rebuilt, but its book collection hasn't. The students each created a bookmark and donated a used book to be shipped along with 80 new books donated by Indigo Books and Music. The initiative was part of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa's fifth annual Mitzvah Day.

World

Students Suspended

NAPLES, Fla. — Ten Florida middle school students were suspended for taking part in a "Kick a Jew" day. Administrators of the North Naples Middle School told UPI they'll work on cultural sensitivity training after the Nov. 19 incident, including 20 minutes at the start of the day to focus on character traits, starting with respect and kindness, the Naples Daily News reported. Some local Jewish leaders decried the fact that the perpetrators only served an in-school suspension, as mandated by the school's bullying and harassment policy.

Teachers' Strike Ends

PHILADELPHIA — A strike at Jack M. Barrack Hebrew Academy near Philadelphia ended last week when its teachers ratified a five-year contract. The strike, which centred on pension contributions, shut down the school for a week.

Welsh Shul Converted

LONDON — The oldest synagogue in Wales will be converted into eight apartments. The renovation of the shul in Merthyr Tydfil, a town of 30,000, is pending permission from city council, the Jewish Chronicle reported. Built in the 1870s, the shul is empty and the target of vandals. It had been used as a Christian centre and a gym after it closed in 1983.

Assassination Foiled

SANA'A — Two men who reportedly planned to assassinate Yemen's Chief Rabbi Yahya Yusuf Musa, head of the country's small Jewish community, were arrested Nov. 19 in Yemen, Reuters reported. In a TV interview, the rabbi had criticized Shiite rebels currently fighting in Yemen. Between 200 and 300 Jews live in Yemen, mostly in the north, where they have been subjected to increasing harassment and violence.

Sports Owner Backed Jewish Causes

Abe Pollin

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Abe Pollin, a longtime supporter of Israel and Jewish causes, has died at the age of 85.

Pollin, best known as the owner of the Washington Wizards basketball team and the Verizon Center the team played in, served on the boards of AIPAC, Hillel, and the Israel Project, and was involved in many philanthropic activities outside the Jewish community. He also was an activist for Soviet Jewish refuseniks in the 1970s and '80s, pressing the issue with government leaders and elsewhere.

More recently, Pollin was one of three Washington developers who in 2004 bought and restored the Sixth & I Historic Synagogue, former home of the Adas Israel synagogue, before it could be turned into a night club. It's now a magnet for younger Jews, sponsoring a variety of Jewish and cultural programs, and is in the same area Pollin revitalized when he built the Verizon Center.

Pollin changed the name of his basketball team from Bullets to Wizards as a statement against gun violence after the assassination of his longtime friend, Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, in 1995.

Toronto surgeon makes long-distance house call

Save a Child's Heart board members visit Nablus

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Dr. Bernard Goldman and a delegation of about a dozen visitors to Israel went off the beaten track last month to visit three young cardiac patients and their families in the Palestinian town of Nablus.

Initially, guards at the checkpoint wouldn't let the Jewish visitors in, Goldman recalled in an interview at the Toronto offices of Save a Child's Heart, Canada (saveachildsheart.ca).

Goldman, a semi-retired cardiac surgeon, was in Israel for the organization's first international board meeting, along with half a dozen other Torontonians.

But, said Goldman – who is chair of the board of SACH Canada and serves on SACH Israel's medical advisory board – explanations from a Palestinian cardiologist smoothed the way.

Their first stops were at the homes of patients who had undergone life-saving heart surgery courtesy of the Israeli non-profit organization, which offers treatment to children from developing countries.

"We wondered if there would be any negative repercussions on the families [in Nablus,]" said Karen Diamond, president of SACH Canada, who also visited there. But, she added, "there was no indication anywhere that there was any negativity associated with our visit. The families were so gracious and appreciative."

Diamond said the families knew that their visitors were Jewish, and "it was explained to them that we were part of a team that funds the SACH program."

Startling and infuriating

From the editor's desk...

It is a phenomenon we have observed at least since 1967 and certainly since 1973. The level of animosity toward Jews rises in direct proportion to the efforts by Jews – as embodied by the sovereign Jewish state – to defend themselves.

The Jews – Israel – won the war in 1967 but instantly lost their status as underdog in their life-and-death struggle to survive, let alone find acceptance as a nation-state in the Middle East like all the other nation-states there. And worse.

From that date forward, the history of the conflict began to be rewritten. The land, which, since1948 had been considered "disputed," was suddenly regarded as "occupied" now that the Jews ruled.

Moreover, even the PLO, which was established in 1964 and headed by Ahmad Shukairy, staked no claim to the West Bank or to east Jerusalem then. The organization preferred to wait, to bide its time. For it had staked its claim to all of Israel.

In 1973, the Jews again refused to surrender their state, not to mention their lives, to their neighbours. The Jews' dogged ability to defend themselves confirmed once and for all Israel's status as not the underdog in its conflict with the Arabs.

Complicating matters, negative attitudes toward Israel hardened in some quarters after the Persian Gulf states and OPEC wrought economic havoc and severe industrial hardship upon the world by using the distribution of oil throughout the developed and non-developed world as a weapon against Israel.

Whether allowing Jews to live in the West Bank and east Jerusalem would ultimately prove to be demographically wise, or politically smart, or militarily desirable, it certainly could not be said in 1967 or 1973 – in light of the fact that those very same territories after 1948 were almost universally considered to be "disputed" – that doing so was illegal.

Now, after more than four decades of Jewish "occupation" of the disputed lands, the legality of the Jewish communities – the settlements – in the West Bank is mostly academic. Most of the world accepts the view, or mindlessly repeats it, that the settlements are illegal.

The adoption of that unequivocal but legally questionable characterization of the Jewish presence in the West Bank these past four decades has also altered the narrative of the history of the conflict for a great many people.

The negative view of the Jewish state has hardened even further. The outcomes of the wars proved that Israel was not the underdog. The "settlements" proved that Israel was also an occupier.

These harsh labels have stuck.

Over the years, especially among the younger generations who have no information or curiosity about pre-1967 and pre-1948 Israel, an entire domain of related, unkind associations with Israel has been cultivated alongside the assiduously cultivated core negative image of the Jewish state as occupier and not the underdog.

What is most startling, however, as well as infuriating and saddening to supporters of Israel, is that the condemnations and criticisms of Israel appear to grow despite the most outrageously inhuman, murderous, sadistic and treacherous behaviour by Israel's terrorist enemies.

Indeed the contrary is true.

As noted previously, animosity toward Jews rises in direct proportion to their efforts to defend themselves.

Thus we have witnessed the severe spikes in anti-Israel, anti-Semitic, attitudes and behaviours for example, after Israel went into Jenin to wipe out the terrorists there, after its strike against Hezbollah in Lebanon and after it fought Hamas in Gaza.

In North America, we do not see the worst of the anti-Semitic behaviour, or even much of it. But in Europe, the situation is very troubling, fuelled in many countries by the presence of large Muslim communities.

In a recent story on anti-Semitism in Europe, Morten Berthelsen reported in Ha'aretz that "Israel is still demonized, Nazified; it is the harbinger of all evil, racism, colonialism, imperialism and ethnic genocide. This is evident through practically the entire European media, in news reports, op-eds, editorials, cartoons – and the anti-Israel approach of the media is becoming far more distinct with the emergence of an Arabic media of hostile messages dished up as journalism, religious spin and children's TV shows.

"Biased reporting and fixation on Israeli crimes – proven or not – are paving the way for neo-Nazis, radical Islamists, right-wing and left-wing extremists to coalesce… in Sweden and France. Boycott campaigns and anti-Semitic NGOs openly funded by European Union member-states feed Islam's battle of rhetoric against the Jews… it is high time the media realized the link between its inflammatory reporting on Israel and physical attacks on Jews and Jewish institutions in the countries where the reports are published or broadcast."

The eve of Chanukah, perhaps, is an appropriate occasion to reflect on this unsettling, modern phenomenon. Our ancient ancestors showed us that we must not be cowed by the very blatant attempts to intimidate us. As York University professor Martin Lockshin has written, the best way to answer the anti-Semite is to "be Jewish." We can add to this, the best way to answer the anti-Israel advocate is to counter with evidence of the justice of Israel's cause. It would help first, of course, if all of us knew our history, and thus the cause of Israel's justice.

Zareinu kids get chance to shine at fashion show

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

The Royal Ontario Museum was all dressed up Nov. 17 for the annual Zareinu Fashion Show, and the event didn't disappoint.

Now in its sixth year of serving up high fashion, the evening raised $200,000 for the school's classes, services and one-on-one therapies for physically and developmentally disabled children.

But with a runway worthy of Paris or New York, the show's unique blend of style and sentiment makes it more than just a fundraising event.

"Each year we get more sophisticated and polished, and today we boast one of the finest fashion shows outside of Fashion Week which, at the same time, creates awareness and raises badly needed funds for Zareinu," said Stacy Markin, who together with Renee Rosenzweig, co-chaired the event.

Hosted by none other than Fashion Television's Jeanne Beker, the show featured the clothing of Canadian designers NADA and Thien Le alongside the children's clothing label Little Ones.

Admitting that she hadn't heard of Zareinu prior to coming on board for the event, host Beker stressed the need to raise awareness for the school. "I couldn't believe that a place so wonderful existed right here in Toronto!" she said.

Keeping it traditional, the night's looks ranged from NADA's lady-like chic to classic exoticism with Thien Le.

"It's a beautiful event for an incredibly important cause," said Nada Shepherd of NADA.

A combined effort to raise awareness and funds with passion and love, the Zareinu Fashion Show team included event producer Len D. Henry of Fashcam, tribute chair Senator Linda Frum, director Randy Spiegel and co-ordinator Shawna Samuel.

Dazzling models in towering heels took to the runway to showcase clothes from the two designers' spring 2010 collections, with the evening ending theatrically in a fantastical mock-geisha performance by a model carrying a gilded umbrella while swathed in Thien Le's rich silks and florals.

But the true stars of the show were the Zareinu children, who made their runway debuts parading the fun and colourful wears of Little Ones, with the help of friends and siblings.

"Watching the children walk down the runway has incredible meaning and really showcases in a different way all the hard work the children, their teachers, therapists and families put in," Markin said.

"All you have to do is look at their faces."

Indeed, the children's runway was the highlight of the show, even for those who aren't connected with the school directly. The kids strutted, skipped, smiled and generally pulled at guests' heartstrings.

The evening's message spoke to Zareinu's impact on people in the community – from parents such as Jared Florence, who spoke about his premature triplets who have cerebral palsy and attend the school, to Markin herself, whose daughter is a Zareinu alumnus.

"I watched my 14-year-old daughter, Shayna, walk down the runway with such determination," she said. "She was holding her twin siblings' hands. I was overcome with emotion, because I caught her eye, and she flashed me a smile… if she could speak, at that moment, she would have said, 'Look at me now, Mom!'"

"Our world is a better place because of difference – we are more compassionate and more sensitive," said Ruth Zive, a Zareinu board member and parent. "Kids with disabilities and differences would be completely marginalized if there weren't places like Zareinu."

From the fashions to the warm speeches, the night was a major success.

"We not only raised money, but we raised awareness about children with special needs and what a significant part of the community Zareinu is," Markin said. "It was outstanding!"

Social networking groups co-opted for hate, terror

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Simon Wiesenthal Centre has been monitoring the Internet for about 10 years – beginning when there were just a handful of URLs that could be designated as "hate sites" – but their most recent audit uncovered a disturbing development.

Terrorists appear to be co-opting a tactic originated by racist fringe groups that they dub "the lone wolf strategy," which envisions highly motivated individuals acting to further an ideological goal without necessarily joining a group of like-minded people, said Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center.

Rabbi Cooper was in Toronto last week to release a DVD that highlights problematic web pages. Departing from past years, when the title of the disc was some variation of "Digital Hate," this year's edition is called "Facebook, YouTube + how social media outlets impact digital terrorism and hate."

Rabbi Cooper suggested that Maj. Nidal Hasan, who shot dozens of fellow U.S. soldiers at a Texas military base last month, fits the profile of a lone wolf acting out an extremist ideology.

Hasan reportedly used the Internet to communicate with an online mentor, Anwar Al Awlaki, who once ran a U.S. mosque.

Al Awlaki, a radical imam who now resides in Yemen, has authored a text titled 44 Ways to Support Jihad, and investigators have shown that Hasan exchanged e-mails with Al Awlaki prior to his Fort Hood rampage.

The Wiesenthal Center also found dozens of disturbing Facebook groups. Its latest DVD reports that one supports Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah, while others support jihad in Chechnya and Al Qaeda in Somalia. A Turkish Facebook site was found to support jihad, while another was titled "The Islamic Ruling on the Permissibility of Martyrdom Operations."

Another, hosted on an American computer, applauds the 2008 terrorist attack on the Merkaz HaRav Yeshiva in Jerusalem that claimed eight lives. Another Facebook group is called "Hamas fans" and includes a caution to Facebook administrators not to remove the page, citing the UN Declaration on Human Rights as an authority for their free speech rights.

Rabbi Cooper said Wiesenthal Center personnel recently met with Facebook officials, arguing that these sites violate the company's own terms of usage. Facebook, he suggested, sees itself as a leader of online developments and should take action.

The move to a "lone wolf" approach came after extremist racist groups saw only "modest results" when trying to create a mass movement. "We saw a shift in strategy from recruiting to groups to urging them to create cells with one or two people or act alone," he said.

The extremists even adopted a biblical name as a code phrase for the approach, calling it the "Phineas priesthood" after the priest who killed two people following the Exodus. "It is a code word for the courage to act out ideals," Rabbi Cooper said. "So, we see a transmutation of a tactic from the lunatic fringe and co-opted by pro-Al Qaeda [militants] interested in deadly attacks around the world."

While the Wiesenthal Center has identified more than 10,000 hate sites, "more and more of the postings are being done in social networking sphere and on blogs [web journals]. One posting can go viral," he said.

Facebook is being used as a tool to entice people to extremists' core values. Contrasting the European response to extremism on the Internet, which is to enact protocols against it, and the American reluctance to infringe on free speech, Rabbi Cooper said Canada has struck the proper balance, with Internet service providers willing to listen to concerns over hate speech.

Rabbi Cooper said Nazi-style games and those that promote Hezbollah are proving popular with young people. Some 30 per cent of Toronto teens admit to playing these types of violent games, which denigrate target groups.

Kids argue they can separate the contents of games from personal attitudes, but Rabbi Cooper worries they will "buy into the message of hate or terrorism."

The CJN's efforts to reach Facebook for comment on the issue were unsuccessful.

CYBER SAFETY: Associated Hebrew School's Danilack Middle School recently hosted cyberspace safety expert Chris Vollum, who gave tips to Grade 6, 7 and 8 students on how to improve their security and privacy settings on such social networking sites as Facebook. Pictured with Vollum, from left, are Grade 7 students Aby Volcovich, Josh Sinclair, Andrew Klein, Jonathan Gootgarts, Linnaea Halpert, Naomi Stochinsky, Rebecca Starkman and Naomi Mishan.

In 1957, Barry and Philomena Lowes pursued their dream and founded Camp Timberlane, a residential summer camp located on a private lake in Haliburton Ontario. Their vision was to create a camping experience that would build confidence, spirit and leadership. They strived to provide a nurturing environment that would recognize a person's uniqueness and where values would be learned that would benefit them over a lifetime. The tradition continues today and is being carried on for future generations by the present Director and owner Corey Mandell.

After 52 years, Barry and Phil are committed more than ever to their life pursuit of making camping available to the new generations of children. To make this possible, they have created "Share the Magic"; an endowment with the sole objective of introducing new campers to the Timberlane experience.

Iran merely flouts the West, again

The Iran file once again rose to the top of the international community's agenda last week. Iran's parliament on Sunday approved a bill that dedicates another $20 million (US) for the support of militant groups that oppose the West.

Of course there is not much news in the fact that Iran sends money and all other manner of support to "militant" (read terrorist) groups. It is already widely known to be the main bankroller of Islamic extremists in the Middle East, such as Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Gaza Strip, and of terrorist forces as far away as Central and South America.

The news was in the demonstratively open manner in which the pronouncement was made with legislative imprimatur no less. The money flows to terrorists not from the secret budgets of the Revolutionary Guard, but out in the open, from the general treasury of the people, so to speak.

It was hardly a coincidence that the announcement was made two days after the International Atomic Energy Agency's board of governors voted 25-3 (with six abstentions) on Sunday to rebuke Iran for its refusal to accept tighter scrutiny of its nuclear activities. Especially noteworthy in the vote was the fact that all five permanent members of the Security Council – Russia, China, France, Britain, and the United States – supported the resolution. Cuba, Venezuela and Malaysia were the lone dissenters.

The censure of Iran was triggered by the report of outgoing head of the IAEA, Mohamed ElBaradei, to the agency's 35-nation board of governors that the IAEA investigation into Iran's alleged nuclear weapons program is at "a dead end" due to Iran's lack of co-operation.

The statement by ElBaradei stood in stark absurd relief against the threat on Sunday by Iran's parliamentary speaker, Ali Larijani, to reduce Tehran' s (non-existent) co-operation level with the IAEA if the West continues to pressure the Islamic state over its nuclear program. "If the West continues to pressure us, then parliament can review Iran's co-operation level with the IAEA," Larijani said. After Larijani spoke, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad announced that his cabinet had ordered the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran to begin building five new uranium enrichment sites that had already been approved and to propose five additional locations for uranium enrichment sites within two months.

The discussions in the UN and the IAEA about the Iranian march to nuclear weapons provides nothing more to the Iranian rulers than mild entertainment. Iran flouts the West. It is long past due to move from discussions to severe incremental sanctions against Iran. At this point, the hard sanctions may no longer be enough stop the nuclear program. But we know that arid, ineffective debates cannot.

A Canadian delegation to Ethiopia reported that famine had not reached the province of Gondar, home to most of the Ethiopian Jewish community. In fact, the report said the Jews remaining in Ethiopia weren't nearly in as much need of financial aid as those who had already reached Israel. At the same time, Zina Abee was feted as the first Ethiopian Jewish immigrant to graduate as a registered nurse in Israel.

Inflammatory rhetoric for political gains

Over the last few weeks, deliberately misleading Conservative flyers have been sent to ridings with proportionately high numbers of Jewish voters ("Tories, Liberals spar over Israel," Nov. 26). Amazingly, the flyers are prepared, printed and mailed at taxpayers' expense. MPs are entitled to let voters know about what the government is doing, but this privilege is supposed to be used to let voters know about government initiatives. In this case it is being used for the basest of partisan purposes. Using the propaganda tools of repetitive innuendo and half-truths, the Conservatives used government money to paint Liberals as anti-Semites, which could not be further from the truth.

Let there be no mistake about the facts. Anti-Semitism is a vile bigotry and Liberals deplore it, together with all other forms of bigotry, discrimination and hate. Liberals believe that Israel is entitled to be a stable and secure home for its Jewish residents – indeed for all its residents. Canada has supported Israel since its creation and defends its right to exist. Support for Israel as a democracy is not just a "Jewish" issue. Liberals reflect the reality that Canadians of all backgrounds want to see peace in the Middle East. Peace is too important to use as a propaganda tool for divisive ethnic politics.

Contrary to the divisive flyers, the reality is that Conservatives and Liberals have much the same policy. The Middle East is not a wedge issue between the two parties, as the Conservatives want us to believe. Both parties support a two-state solution. There appears to be consensus behind supporting peace, freedom and development for all peoples. What is most important is that Canada can and should be perceived as a credible honest broker, helping to facilitate negotiations and assisting in economic development and reconstruction. And Canadians should make it clear that this is the role they want Canada to play on the world stage.

The Middle East is too important for partisan politics and inflammatory rhetoric for political gains.

Extreme right wing still a threat (1)

Mindy G. Alter is wrong to suggest that Nazism isn't a threat today ("Rights act and Islamic 'hate speech,'" letters, Nov. 26). Has she not heard or read incidents in the news about the vandalism hate crimes in Ottawa, Calgary and Barrie last month? Tombstones were overturned and swastikas were painted on them. There were spray-painted signs saying "Die Jews" with swastikas.

Survivors of the Holocaust fear that the world today looks disturbingly similar to the world in the early 1930s. What about more recent events in Calgary that have police hunting down two neo-Nazis for attempted murder? If that is not Nazism, then what is?

Extreme right wing still a threat (2)

As residents of Oshawa, London, Barrie, Calgary and Ottawa can attest, letter-writer Mindy G. Alter understates the danger by asserting that extreme right-wing elements in Canada represent a "phantom menace" ("Rights act and Islamic 'hate speech,'" letters, Nov. 26). The blatant and violent anti-Semitic acts perpetrated in these cities are a real threat – community victim impact statements would reflect the harm they inflict. By all means, we must deal with the threats of Islamic extremists, but that should not detract from our ongoing efforts to eliminate anti-Semitism in all of its forms and manifestations.

The new Haman(s)

The first Chanukah was celebrated in Jerusalem on the 25th day of Kislev, 164 BCE, after a victory by the Maccabean forces against the dark, brutal forces of the Syrians. As we celebrate Chanukah 5770, dark clouds of global anti-Semitism, racism and anti-Zionism – a grave threat to peace – loom over Israel. We, the Jewish people, welcome Chanukah 5770 as the holiday of joy and light against the dark forces of the new Haman(s). When the UN General Assembly hosts "leaders" such as Moammar Gadhafi and Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, we Jews must remain steadfast in our fight for peace and justice. The parallels to the past are evident today, as once again we encounter hate and incitement against the Jewish people and the State of Israel. However, Eternal Israel, as always, will prevail! Jerusalem is eternal!

God's promise of land has deep pull on secular Israelis

By RACHEL ELBOIM-DROR
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

Although most of the Jewish population of Israel is secular and therefore seemingly unaffected politically by God's promise of the land to Abraham in Genesis, it appears the divine promise that "I will give unto thee and to thy seed after thee the land of thy sojournings" holds ancient power. The pull is unconscious for most but very deep, which has an effect on most Israelis.

The influence of this justification for our tie to the land on the secular population rises emotionally above all other rights to ownership of the Land of Israel. This phenomenon reveals one of the fundamental contradictions of Israeli society, which has been with the Zionist movement since its inception.

Such a paradox is not unique to us. It can be found in many other societies. However in light of Israel's geopolitical circumstances, and the makeup of its population, in our case it has hidden destructive potential. And because the public debate on such matters is scant and limited to academic circles, most members of the secular public are in no way aware of the political theology they follow.

The concept of a divinely promised land is in contradiction in principle to the values of the Zionist movement, which was primarily a modern, secular nationalist movement.

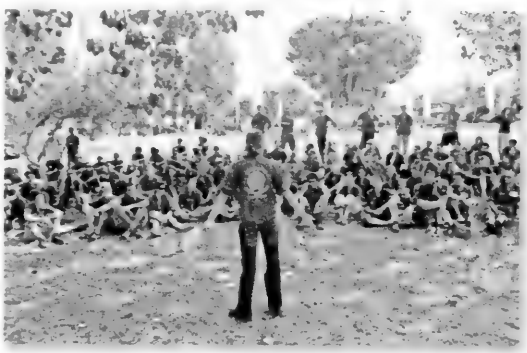
On the other hand, the secular nationalism of Zionism and the State of Israel has messianic religious underpinnings, both conscious and unconscious, and the use of the Hebrew language provides a host of examples of this, such as calling immigration to Israel aliyah, or ascent, and emigration yerida, or descent.

In that vein for example, the father of the revival of the Hebrew language, Eliezer Ben-Yehuda, contended that our right to the land was the right of immigrants to the land and the first immigrant was the patriarch Abraham, who came from Haran.

Most of the world's population, he added, consisted of immigrants, but this fact did not detract from their national rights. One can point to Canada and Australia as countries settled by English immigrants, who became Canadian and Australian in their own right.

Micah Joseph Berdichevsky, on the other hand, believed that our right to the land was the right of conquerors. The children of Israel, led by Joshua, conquered the land, which is how we came to rule it. It was subsequently taken from us by other conquerors.

The Zionist movement for its part spoke of our historic right and the right of self-determination. Theodor Herzl sought legitimacy from the great powers at the time and a seal of approval on the part of international law.



Members of Hashomer Hatza'ir, a movement of the secular left, last year commemorated 90 years in the Land of Israel.

However, as noted above, the deepest sense of the right to the land has roots of another kind. "I will give unto thee and to thy seed after thee the land of thy sojournings" is a resounding voice of political-theological power that takes hold of many secular people.

This explains many phenomena in secular Israeli society, such as the enthusiasm with which left-wing intellectuals and Labor party ministers embraced the Greater Land of Israel; the gap between government policy and practice on the settlements; and the lenient policy toward the haredi, both in exempting them from military service and granting funding for haredi education despite their refusal to allow core subjects to be taught.

And beyond political debate and societal considerations, powerful conscious and subconscious religious and mythical emotions are at work in secular Israeli society, which at times are also connected to feelings of guilt. These emotions and feelings of [social, government and cultural] responsibility also find expression in the operation of Israeli government bureaucracy, which sometimes hinders, rejects and undermines policy it is tasked with carrying out. The result is a range of political declarations that are dead on arrival, unless the United States and European countries step up the pressure.

That is why it is possible to live on one level in an Israeli bubble, and in practice to act on another level at the opposite end of the spectrum.

There is currently a public debate over a plan to have army officials give lectures to teachers in an effort to raise their students' motivation for army service. (A similar idea was implemented, by the way, in Prussia, when they decided to impose compulsory education for everyone. Because there were not enough teachers available for the task, soldiers, especially disabled officers, served as teachers.)

Education Minister Gideon Sa'ar's plan to involve the soldiers reveals the basic failure of the Israeli education system. High school graduates do not have the benefit of a national education based on Jewish cultural tradition in its varied and changing facets. The idea that the future citizens of a democratic state can be educated through one kind or another of political indoctrination is fundamentally flawed.

Without strong roots in Jewish and general culture, including critical discussion of varying opinions, we will not succeed in instilling a sense of national solidarity and we will not produce a generation with a worldview stemming from knowledge and critical humanistic values seeking to build a more egalitarian and just society, both looking inward and outward.

Netanyahu announces settlement construction freeze

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last week announced a 10-month freeze on settlement construction.

"This is a very difficult step for me and my fellow ministers," Netanyahu said in a televised news conference last Wednesday evening. "This is a far-reaching and painful subject."

Israel's security cabinet had approved the freeze almost unanimously shortly before the announcement.

"The government of Israel has taken a very big step towards peace today," Netanyahu said.

Netanyahu also addressed the Palestinians directly.

"This is the time to advance peace together," he said. "Now the Israeli public expects that you will take a courageous step, too."

National Infrastructure Minister Uzi Landau of the Yisrael Beiteinu party was the lone dissenter among the security cabinet's 17 voting members.

Netanyahu said the freeze will not include Israeli's "sovereign capital" of Jerusalem, including eastern Jerusalem. It also will not apply to construction that has been started or authorized in the West Bank, as well as buildings to allow the 300,000 residents of the West Bank to live "a normal life," including, he said, "synagogues, schools, kindergartens and necessary public buildings."

Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Salam Fayyad and chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat both told reporters before the announcement that a settlement freeze was unacceptable without a halt to construction in eastern Jerusalem.

U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton said following the announcement that the construction freeze would help advance the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

"We believe that through good-faith negotiations, the parties can mutually agree on an outcome which ends the conflict and reconciles the Palestinian goal of an independent and viable state based on the 1967 lines [Israel's pre-1967 borders], with agreed swaps, and the Israeli goal of a Jewish state with secure and recognized borders," Clinton said in a statement.

At a news conference at the State Department, the administration's Middle East envoy, George Mitchell, said that "while they fall short of a full freeze, we believe the steps announced by the prime minister are significant and could have substantial impact on the ground. For the first time ever, an Israeli government will stop housing approvals and all new construction of housing units and related infrastructure in West Bank settlements. That's a positive development."

"Nothing like this occurred during the Bush administration," he added later.

Netanyahu told security cabinet members at the start of last Wednesday's meeting that "in the international circumstances that have been created, this step will promote Israel's broad national interests. This is neither simple nor easy, but it has many more advantages than disadvantages. It allows us to place a simple fact before the world: the government of Israel wants to enter into negotiations with the Palestinians, is taking practical steps in order to do so and is very serious in its intentions to promote peace."

Opinions

Heeding Halbertal

I don't know if Richard Goldstone is one of the world's foremost jurists, as many claim, or "a little man devoid of any sense of justice," as Israeli President Shimon Peres suggests. But I do know that philosophy professor Moshe Halbertal is one of the most interesting and perceptive teachers in Israel today. His many accomplishments include helping to draft the ethics code of the Israel Defence Forces.

Rabbi Dovc Marmur in Toronto

Writing last month in the New Republic, Halbertal asserted: "The Goldstone report as a whole is a terrible document. It is biased and unfair. It offers no help in sorting out the issues." But he added that Israel should have co-operated with Goldstone, in order to make him take into account Israeli facts, not only Palestinian allegations.

Though "a good deal of the outrage that has greeted the Goldstone Report is perfectly justified," Halbertal stated that "its sections devoted to the Gaza war do make claims and cite testimonies that no honest Israeli can ignore." These include allegations about civilian deaths, the possible Israeli practice of the use of human shields, the destruction of civilian property and the bombing of civilian infrastructure.

Halbertal is an observant Jew with deep knowledge of the sources of Judaism to which his books testify, and he's totally committed to the State of Israel. He's familiar with the complexities of an army having to fight terrorists in civilian areas, yet recognizes that even in such asymmetrical situations, "the killing of our civilians does not justify the killing of their civilians." He observes that "Israel's siege of Gaza, and its harsh effect upon general civilian life, is morally problematic and strategically counterproductive."

This sane and balanced approach is likely to be very welcome in many Israeli circles, because it in no way suggests disloyalty or gives succour to the enemy. However, mature evaluations of official Israeli actions, even when made by responsible Israelis, often distresses Jews in the Diaspora, who seem to prefer soothing slogans to penetrating analyses. Instead of trying to separate that which must be repudiated in the Goldstone report and that which should be examined under Israeli auspices, many of us are more prone to describe non-Jews who may accept some or all of its findings as anti-Semites and its author as a self-hating Jew.

Though there's much anti-Semitism in the world, and some Jews may indeed despise their origins, our arguments should be made with our heads, not with our guts. If we're serious about supporting Israel and championing its integrity, heeding Halbertal will bring us closer to our objectives than mouthing empty clichés.

Infusing values into Jewish education

Lately, we have been hearing a call for more values education in public schooling, and in Jewish schools as well. In the public sector, values education poses a unique set of problems, in that the "public" is no longer as uniform as it once was. In truth, it was never as uniform as it might have seemed, since there was always a mixture of aboriginal Canadians, English speakers, Francophones, new immigrants, folks of colour, etc.

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

There was once, however, a pre-multicultural consensus on certain key values. Obviously, there's little room for nostalgia for an era that also engendered a great deal of intolerance and blatant racism. But our current society suffers from a values vacuum that can be just as dangerous as earlier situations. The solutions are complex in the public sector and just as challenging in the Jewish domain.

Much of Jewish education is now community-based or situated in the liberal sectors of Jewish life. While some may think that Orthodox Jews have found the answers to values education and training for ethical reasoning, that's not evident in Orthodox schools. In fact, all sectors of Jewish education are challenged in the arena of moral education, and each grouping must search for its own solutions. It starts by distinguishing between legal rules and moral guidelines.

There are obvious societal norms that all cultures share and that can be applied easily for behavioural guidance. Murder, rape, theft and incest are decent examples of behaviour that is universally intolerable. Ethical reasoning doesn't play a part in shunning these violations or "sins." By now, it's almost genetic to know that they're unacceptable. The psychopathic criminal who doesn't recognize the inherent evil in these acts is the exception.

The ultimate challenge to an ethical decision is when two good acts or two evil acts conflict. Choosing the greater good or the lesser evil is a real difficulty that requires both study of certain ethical guidelines and the moral fortitude to make a final decision. One of my personal lessons – one I'll never forget – was that "decide" has its roots in the Latin word decidere (to cut). Deciding on one path cuts all the others.

Of course, we must teach the rules, not depend on some moral DNA. But we must not deceive ourselves into thinking that teaching the rules of positive mitzvot and negative mitzvot is sufficient. It's necessary, but not sufficient. We have an obligation to show our students models of positive and negative behaviour in the long and complex history of our people. We are blessed with a narrative tradition that documents those moments of grace when Jews acted justly and boldly, but that also doesn't censor the errors of the past. Rebecca and Jacob tricked Isaac. Was it for a greater good? King David sinned terribly. Did he repent and learn a lesson? Abraham and Moses each challenged God with audacious moral reasoning. Where did they learn to do that? Yochanan Ben Zakkai opted for Jewish continuity in a lesser setting than the destroyed Jerusalem. How did he choose continuity over martyrdom?

In the multifaceted community that Jews now inhabit, where there are several competing models of Jewish life and where we also include in our population less committed and disaffected Jews, we must find the various paths that will provide values education to the next generation.

While we enjoy some level of success in fostering Jewish identity and transmitting the richness of Jewish literacy to a significant proportion of our youth, it's not evident that the moral teachings of Judaism and those values that are unique to Jewish life are an integral part of various curricula. Schools, camps, supplementary programs, youth groups and even adult learners should reassess their programs to determine if ethical reasoning is on the menu.

Black and white is not the way the world works. Most difficult decisions are in the grey spectrum, and Jews must learn how to operate in that ambiguous environment. One could even say that maturity is the voyage into the grey area of uncertainty.

I miss American Thanksgiving

Always around this time of year, when the crispness of autumn gives way to intimations of the winter ahead, the immigrant in me gives way to nostalgia for the Old Country, south of the border.

There's no denying the feeling: I miss Thanksgiving – or as it's referred to here, American Thanksgiving – very, very much. I suspect that this characterizes most immigrants from the United States, constituting a particular ethnicity.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Canadian Jews don't understand the intense attachment of American Jews to Thanksgiving. As a rule, Canadian Jews don't make a fuss over the October Canadian Thanksgiving, which is lower key in any case. But more to the point, Canadian Jews tend to think of Thanksgiving as a Christian holiday, a kind of lesser Christmas, attached to the religion of the dominant culture, and view the Jewish American embrace of its festivities and ritual with puzzlement or suspicion, seeing in it a mark of assimilation.

But American Jews see Thanksgiving as religiously untethered. It affirms, in a secular venue, values and sentiments that touch the religious sensibility deeply without being attached to a particular religion.

Neither Jewish nor Christian – nor any other distinctive faith – it's the holiday we can all share. Secular Jews, liberal Jews and modern Orthodox Jews all make Thanksgiving their own. It symbolizes the possibility of being American without giving up the distinctiveness of one's own heritage.

Several years ago, I was visiting the home of some friends a few days before Thanksgiving. Their son came in from school, proudly brandishing a drawing of a turkey he'd done in his first grade class.

"Noam, can you tell me the story of Thanksgiving?" his mother asked.

"You don't know?!" he said with the mix of wonderment and scorn that native-born children sometimes reserve for their immigrant parents.

"Well, I do know, but I'd like to hear you tell it."

Her son proceeded to tell the standard school narrative of the origins of the holiday: pilgrims, refugees from the constraints and restrictions of European life, seeking and finding freedom on the shores of the new world, learning from and sharing with the native people.

"Our ancestors," he began, "landed on Plymouth Rock…"

While his doubts about his mother's familiarity, as an immigrant, with the Thanksgiving narrative, makes it clear that he knows he descends from people who reached the New World much later than the Pilgrims, and on some vehicle other than the Mayflower, in his retelling of the story, these founders of the American story become his mythic ancestors.

And why not? For American Jews – and not just children – the story of Jewish immigration is overlaid on the story of the Pilgrims. Both see the New World as offering a respite from religious persecution to people wanting to begin a new life unencumbered by the ingrained prejudices of the Old World. The American story is the Jewish story, and vice versa. The holiday expresses the best of the American dream.

Far from feeling foreign or alien, Thanksgiving resonates with the way Jews celebrate festivals: ritual meals, families coming together, the harvest of Sukkot meeting the seder of Pesach, the pause from the chaotic press of life to reflect and be grateful.

On the rare years that my schedule allows for it, I bring my family to the United States for Thanksgiving. Most of the time, I stay in my Canadian home and yearn.

This year, I've reversed the pattern. Spending part of the year living in Washington, D.C., to work on a book project, I yearn for home. So I decided to come home to Canada for American Thanksgiving. I still miss the slowing down, hunkering down, of the American holiday, with its four-day weekend and home spun rituals. But I have much for which to be thankful here: my wonderful husband and family, the extraordinary community we live in, our gracious friends, my fine colleagues at York University, a society that embraces social ethics, thousands of lakes, and an awe-inspiring wilderness. Wherever we are, we give thanks.

The Kirshner File

A glint of hope in the Mideast

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Last June, a couple of days before U.S. President Barack Obama was due to deliver a prime-time speech in Cairo on American policy in the Middle East, he raised hopes that he could get serious talks between Israel and the Palestinian Authority back on track.

Until very recently, Obama had precious little to show for his diplomatic efforts, with the peace process being stuck in neutral gear, as it has been since the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising nine years ago. But now there is a glint of hope on the horizon.

Last week, following a grandiose claim by Israeli President Shimon Peres that peace is only a "step away," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced a 10-month freeze on the construction of new residential housing in the West Bank, but not in eastern Jerusalem, saying he hoped it would lead to a renewal of peace talks and a historic peace agreement with the Palestinians.

In a separate development, the president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, rebutted a rumour that the PA had taken a strategic decision to declare a third uprising in reaction to the current deadlock. Declaring that the Palestinians would not resort to violence to achieve statehood, he said, "The Palestinian people are only thinking about the road toward peace… We will not go back to an intifadah."

Although the Obama administration welcomed Netanyahu's statement as a step forward, the Palestinian prime minister, Salam Fayyad, warned that a settlement freeze without a halt to construction in eastern Jerusalem was a half measure and unacceptable.

Netanyahu's belated decision reinforces, more or less, Obama's well-intentioned and important vision of a two-state solution. But if the PA's rejection of Netanyahu's move proves to be permanent, the peace process may well remain in limbo.

In his speech in Egypt six months ago, Obama talked about "two peoples with legitimate aspirations" and enunciated a philosophy in which Israelis and Palestinians would recognize each other's national rights.

In keeping with Washington's long-held view that unilateral acts by Israel in the West Bank represent an impediment to progress, Obama called for a complete settlement freeze and observed, "The United States does not accept the legitimacy of continued Israeli settlements." In a nod to the 2003 "road map" peace plan, which has yet to be implemented by either Israel or the Palestinians, he added, "The construction violates previous agreements and undermines efforts to achieve peace."

Obama's demand and its corollary, the cessation of natural growth within settlements, was repeatedly echoed by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and George Mitchell, his special representative to the Mideast.

The idea of a settlement freeze is hardly novel. Previous U.S. presidents, particularly George W. Bush's father, exerted various degrees of pressure on Israel to cease such construction, but to little avail. During the Oslo peace process, the number of Jewish settlers in the West Bank doubled.

Obama was certainly aware of the problem, but he regarded a settlement freeze as essential if his vision was to be realized.

At the very least, he thought, it would bring the Palestinians to the table, prompt Arab states to make reciprocal gestures of normalization to Israel, encourage greater Arab support for a tougher global approach to Iran's nuclear ambitions, perhaps ease the planned U.S. withdrawal from Iraq and garner more Muslim backing for combating the rising Taliban insurgency in Afghanistan.

Realizing that he could no longer defy Obama and thus imperil Israel's alliance with the United States, and eager to please his vital Labor party coalition partner, Defence Minister Ehud Barak, Netanyahu finally endorsed the principle of Palestinian statehood, but he was characteristically vague on territorial details. He conditioned his endorsement on the demilitarization of a Palestinian state and Palestinian recognition of Israel as a Jewish state. These qualifications virtually silenced critics in Netanyahu's Likud party, many of whose members oppose Palestinian statehood.

Even after Netanyahu embraced a two-state solution, the current peace process was bogged down in a welter of recriminations, partly because he was adamantly opposed to a full settlement freeze in the West Bank. The impasse reminded observers of George W. Bush's abortive effort to settle the Arab-Israeli dispute through the Annapolis talks.

Netanyahu, however, expressed a readiness to slow down the pace of construction in the West Bank for six to nine months. Reports suggested that he had not approved new construction there since assuming office nine months ago.

Further, in a bid to improve Palestinian freedom of movement and thereby enhance economic development in the West Bank, a cornerstone of his policy, Netanyahu ordered the removal of scores of roadblocks and permitted Israeli Arabs to visit Jenin, a former redoubt of suicide bombers.

Unimpressed by Netanyahu's policies and deeply suspicious of his motives, Abbas asserted that he would not return to negotiations unless Israel committed to a full settlement freeze. His chief negotiator, Saeb Erekat, blamed Israel for the deadlock and dashed hopes that talks would resume soon.

In line with his definition of a settlement freeze, Netanyahu intends to finish about 3,000 housing units in the West Bank, while proceeding with new construction in eastern Jerusalem, which Israel annexed in 1967. Whether he will go ahead with plans to build an additional 900 units in Gilo – a neighbourhood in East Jerusalem – is uncertain. Netanyahu's insistence on building in eastern Jerusalem will surely compound the existing impasse, since the Palestinians claim it as their future capital.

The other factors that inhibit progress are the following: Abbas' refusal to recognize Israel as a Jewish state, Abbas' insistence that some Palestinian refugees have a "right to return" to their former homes in what is now Israel, the ideological split between the mainstream Fatah Palestinian movement and Hamas (which seized the Gaza Strip in the summer of 2007), the reluctance by Arab states to normalize relations with Israel prior to a complete settlement freeze, Israel's continuing construction of the separation barrier, Netanyahu's opposition to returning to the 1967 borders, and the Israeli army's ongoing anti-terror operations in the West Bank.

Obama's envoy, Mitchell, who has been on the job since last winter, has shuttled to Israel and the Palestinian territories in an attempt to sort out these pressing problems, but has failed to make a breakthrough.

Having met resistance, the Obama administration recently regrouped. Two and a half months ago, in the wake of Netanyahu's only meeting with Abbas, which yielded no tangible results whatsoever, Obama switched gears. Calling for a resumption of IsraeliPalestinian talks "without pre-conditions," he urged the two sides to address permanent status issues such as final borders, refugees and Jerusalem. Obama's volte face left Abbas in something a lurch. Stung by the president's evolving position, Abbas threatened to resign and ask the United Nation's Security Council to unilaterally recognize Palestinian statehood. In response, Netanyahu warned that he can take further unilateral steps.

Obama began his term as president with a belief that he might be able to untangle the Gordian knot of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Based on his performance, there is no reason to surmise that he will succeed where others have failed. But with Netanyahu having endorsed a partial settlement freeze in the West Bank, the dynamics may have improved.

Live with passion, CEO tells young people

JUMP relaunches; moves into Toronto digs

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

On Sept. 11, 2001, three things happened in Joelle Adler's life: her husband, who was suffering from cancer-related complications, had his leg amputated; she found out about the terrorist attacks in New York City, and she watched a commercial about starving children in Africa.

"It hit me: the value of that child and the value of my husband was all the same value. Zero," Adler, CEO of Diesel Canada, told a group of young Jewish professionals on Nov. 19, during the Jewish Urban Meeting Place's (JUMP) relaunch week.

Adler told the audience she spent Sept. 11, 2001, with her husband in the hospital, trying to convince his doctor that he would survive, even though she was constantly being told otherwise.

Joelle Adler

"There was no value for a human life. The decisions made in the hospital and… in Africa were economic decisions. It's cheaper for my husband to die, for the kids in Africa to die," she said.

That night, Adler's mind wandered to a poster she saw in the hospital with the words, "Save one life, you save the universe."

"What does it really mean? [It means] every life has the same value. That is a lesson for us to understand," she said.

The idea led Adler, whose husband beat his cancer but eventually died from a relapse, to found ONEXONE in 2005, a charity that helps feed, clothe and educate children worldwide.

Adler's lecture was one of five events that marked JUMP's relaunch after the two-year-old organization moved from Yonge and Centre streets in Thornhill to a storefront location on Yonge Street just north of Davisville Avenue in mid-town Toronto.

JUMP, which is funded by private philanthropists, moved to new digs last month to be closer and more accessible to its users, said program and marketing manager Shoshana Allen.

Adler's talk also helped launch Jewish Employment Toronto (JET), a joint program between JUMP and Birthright Israel. The program will include lectures, workshops and networking events catered to young Jewish professionals aged 21 to 34, Allen said.

"I'm not an economist, but I think it's always a good time to be working on professional skills. It's not only for people who are unemployed," she said.

As a businessperson and philanthropist, Adler was the perfect speaker to start up the program, Allen said, adding that the CEO can teach the audience about the importance of professional motivation and philanthropy.

"That's why we chose Joelle Adler. Her story is so inspirational."

Adler's charity, ONEXONE, has created breakfast programs, set up organized sport events and helped provide clean drinking water to children worldwide.

"We've been to Africa, Haiti – we've seen the worst and we've seen hope," Adler said.

During her talk, Adler emphasized the importance of passion, not just in work but in life.

"One of the things I think changes… lives is living a life of passion. Passion is an act, not an emotion. It's opening your heart… to something that you know is a risk," she said. "The word 'no' has not been an option for me… since 2001."

Julia Savitch, 29, who works in a marketing research company, attended the lecture partly because she wanted to meet Adler.

"I thought the opportunity to network and listen to somebody who has achieved so much would be useful," she said.

Ronen Geisler, 26, who works for a marketing company, was impressed by JUMP's event, which included time for socializing before the lecture.

"I think it's a good way to reconnect with the Jewish community," he said. "As we grow older, we grow apart… having these types of events is really good."

NCSY chief wants to help 'Jewish kids stay Jewish'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Glenn Black's introduction to NCSY, the international youth organization of the Orthodox Union, dates back to his student days at Yeshiva University, when a fellow student invited him to go to a Shabbaton in New Jersey and serve as an adviser.

"That's how I started," recalls the 40-year-old CEO of NCSY Canada, which will honour Prime Minister Stephen Harper at an event Dec. 7 in Toronto. "This is my first and only job so far."

More precisely, Rabbi Black has a new job – a newly created job – with the same organization. Until recently, he was regional director of NCSY Canada, one of 14 regional NCSY offices, which encompasses Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, Halifax, Hamilton, Kitchener, Oshawa, London and Kingston.

Rabbi Glenn Black

Rabbi Leib Irons, formerly of Detroit and Israel, has taken on Rabbi Black's previous position.

In the 18 years that Rabbi Black has been working for NCSY in Toronto, "we've become extremely strategic in how we do things, [but] the goal is really the same – to get Jewish kids to stay Jewish," he said.

When he started working with the organization, the rabbi was one of three staff members, he said in an interview at his office in Thornhill, Ont.

Now, he oversees a $3-million annual budget and a staff of 25 full-timers and about 40 part-timers, as well as six staff members in Ottawa and three in Montreal.

In programs based at public schools and in NCSY's Torah High classes, "we talk about living a Jewish life, and Jewish values," Rabbi Black said. "For so many kids, it's the first time they're having this conversation.

"We open the doors, offer free pizza, and offer dialogue in a fun way."

Every four years – the length of time Rabbi Black considers a "generation" in the life of teenagers – youngsters "drop further and further down in this black hole of assimilation," which he defines as "a Jew not identifying with who they are and leaving their true Jewish identity for another identity."

His work offers a synergy between his Judaic background and his business background, he said. The rabbi, who studied marketing and administration in university, grew up in an Orthodox home and received smichah from the late Rabbi Pinchas Hirschsprung, then chief rabbi of Montreal, where Rabbi Black grew up.

"I felt the responsibility I would have in this world would be to market Judaism," Rabbi Black said.

However, he added, there is no expectation that students will become Jewishly observant.

"What we want to accomplish is that 100 per cent take responsibility for themselves and their Judaism."

Among Rabbi Black's NCSY projects is Torah High, a program that began in Toronto in 2003 and is now offered as well in Ottawa, Hamilton, Vancouver, Seattle, Chicago and Cleveland.

The program, of which Rabbi Black is executive director, offers high school credits as well as non-credit certificate courses such as krav maga (a self-defence system developed in Israel). He is working to expand Torah High to more cities, and also to introduce a parent-teen component. The program serves more than 500 teens each year.

Another focus for Rabbi Black in his new role is professional development and strategic planning for NCSY across North America.

Outside of work hours, he and his wife, Hennie, whose four children range in age from seven to 14, host an estimated 500 to 700 teenagers a year for Shabbat and holiday meals.

"My Shabbos has become a focus group, listening to the kids."

eCJN makes paper easily accessible

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Whether they are in Ottawa, Vancouver or Israel, young Jewish professionals worldwide can connect with the Jewish community through the eCJN.

The online edition of the paper, which includes both the Montreal and Toronto versions, is ideal for students who are living on campus, said David Collin, the paper's promotions and circulation manager.

"The core market for the eCJN is the youth of Canada and the world," he said.

"The view of The CJN is, 'My parents subscribe, so I read it when they receive it.' That's the intention here, so parents will see it as a gift… to foster a growing Jewish identity."

The eCJN, which was started in 2007, is a convenient way to get the paper, Collin said.

"You can save the file and read it at your leisure," he said of the eCJN, which can be downloaded by using a log-in.

"The mission of the eCJN is to be able to provide access to the content in the print edition for those… in a different vicinity," he said. "All provinces outside of the delivery vicinity can access immediate information."

With the print edition, international readers, including former Canadians who have made aliyah in Israel, usually have to wait at least two weeks to receive their copy. With the eCJN, they can read the paper every Tuesday, which is earlier than most Torontonians, Collin said.

The electronic edition of The CJN was started in 2007, when the paper updated its website. Before then, the paper posted supplements as PDF files online, which are still available today.

The supplements add convenience and shelf life for advertisers, Collin said. Eventually, the online supplements evolved into a whole paper, advertisements and all.

"It was a matter of how to get it small enough," said Michael Stavsky, a member of The CJN production staff. Stavsky, who initially had the idea for an online edition of the paper, said the eCJN is a big change for those living in Israel.

"For people who lived in Israel… it took weeks to get out there," he said of the print edition.

For Collin, who usually converts the paper to the online edition, the eCJN is a way to keep up with other publications, which are focusing on their online editions.

"As part of the media landscape, there is an ongoing debate as to the inherent value of a physical paper that one can flip through," he said. While Collin didn't suggest switching to online-only newspapers, he sees the value of having both a print and online edition, especially if a reader has bad eyesight.

"A bonus is the PDFs can be zoomed in on to such a size that it makes the text easily readable. In print, it's one font size," he said.

Collin is also hoping the eCJN will get youth interested in Heebonics, a section oriented to young Jewish professionals.

"The tagline of Heebonics is: 'And now for something completely different.' In a way, that's what eCJN is as well," he said. "It's because of the way it can be delivered, the price point and the shelf life of the editorial content."

Heebonics and the eCJN are both a way for youth who have moved to different provinces or countries to reconnect.

"The CJN is looking to reach out to the youth… who feel that they are disconnected from the Jewish community," Collin said.

Subscriptions to eCJN cost $19.95 per year plus applicable taxes. A subscription grants access to the online Toronto national edition and the Montreal local edition. Subscriptions to the print edition, which include access to the eCJN, cost $37.80 per year for Canadian readers and $135 for readers outside of Canada.

Ve'ahavta's Starry Nights Awards Ceremony 2009

Todah raba, thank you to the Toronto Jewish community for your support of Ve'ahavta and our Starry Nights Awards Ceremony. We are very grateful and proud of our combined tikun olam efforts!

From All of Us at Ve'ahavta, Happy Chanukah!

Did you know that the word "Chanukah" shares the same root as "Chinuch" – to educate? This Chanukah celebrate Jewish freedom by giving an underprivileged child the gift of learning. Sponsor a Kinder Kit for $18.

Your donation will provide school supplies for impoverished children around the world, giving them the tools to battle poverty.

To "give a little gelt" visit www.veahavta.org or call 416-964-7698. Please ask about our Chanukah Kinder Kit tribute cards.

Dollars for David campaign a family affair

Na'amat aids Israeli daycare centres

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Co-ordinating Na'amat Canada, Toronto's Dollars for David campaign is a three-generation family affair for mother-and-daughter team Janis Spinner and Joanna Shore.

The fundraising project helps provide toys, books, games and other Chanukah treats to needy Israeli children being cared for at Na'amat facilities.

Hundreds of envelopes are distributed to students in Hebrew day and supplementary schools, asking them to share their Chanukah gelt with children in Na'amat daycare centres in Israel. The teachers and staff at Bialik Hebrew Day School ask their students to contribute to Dollars for David in their honour in lieu of gifts.

Shore, Spinner's daughter and now a mother with two young children, said that when she was a student at Bialik, they had not yet developed a computer program to create the cards, so all of them were written by hand. "I can remember these cards taking over the whole house."

She joined Na'amat in 2002, but in her heart, she said, she's been a member since birth.

Spinner said her late father used to pick up envelopes from the Bialik office. "Dollars for David is our family's pet project."

A Na'amat member since 1978, Spinner said that her late mother, Clara Starkman, was also a longtime member.

"What is really amazing though, is that my husband was educated at a Na'amat school in Israel and claims that the organization made a mensch out of him. He is now an honorary member."

She was in Israel last month, she said, to rededicate a plaque at a Na'amat daycare in honour of her parents.

Shore said the beauty of Dollars for David, is that kids are helping kids. "They're learning to share with other kids less fortunate than them."

In the few weeks leading up to Chanukah, she said, the campaign takes over her house. "We send out at least 825 envelopes to Bialik alone, and they all come back to me. It's gratifying, though. I love it.

"There are a lot of disadvantaged people, and there is a lot of work that needs to be done on their behalf."

She said that her older son will be attending Bialik next year, and he'll also help out with the campaign. "We're coming up to our fourth generation."

B FOR BINGO: Harry Fiedler, a trustee of the Linitzer Benefit Society, is seen at the society's 41st annual Children's Bingo, held this year at the St. Alban's Boys and Girls Club. The bingo is held for underprivileged kids and no money is ever raised. All prizes are donated by generous companies, and every child won at least one game.

The guests make the party

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Event planning is big business. Much effort goes into a successful event – the catering, the décor, the theme, the music and the entertainment. Items such as choice of flowers and colour scheme take on a level of importance worthy of serious debate and consideration. Food choices can result in much deliberation, and often all of these and their resulting cost become a recipe for what is known as pre-event anxiety.

Through A Sephardi Window

Anxiety in and of itself is, of course, not the desired goal, but it seems that in order to make "the perfect event," a bit of anxiety – indeed, even perhaps a bit of bad blood among those making the decisions – is worthwhile in order to translate one vision into reality and have the once-in-a-lifetime party, one in which forethought has been given to every minute detail.

Usually, this is how we approach wedding planning. After having arrived at some sort of acceptance of the high cost of the affair and after having almost worked out a way to come up with the necessary funds, we get to work putting on the most spectacular, most memorable and most successful wedding ever.

There is, however, an element that is overlooked: every day, someone out there is planning a wedding and is doing so with the same choice of colour schemes, flowers, menu, venues, bands and caterers, and within more or less the same budget.

Making this fantasy of the most perfect, most memorable, most spectacular event come true is just that: a fantasy.

One local bridal show featured a roundtable discussion with four seasoned and respected bridal consultants. Individually, and certainly as a group, these consultants had seen and done it all. Their topic was, of course, "The Perfect Event." They each related and discussed stories, from the simplest and brightest ideas that worked to the most expensive excesses that didn't.

What was for me downright fascinating was the unanimous answer given by these professionals as to what, in their opinion, is the most important ingredient in that elusive perfect/spectacular/memorable event.

All four said the same thing, and each did so with total conviction and authority: "the guests."

Yes, you read that right – it's not the menu, the decor, the main course or the budget, but the invited guests!

There's something amiss today when the bride and groom feel they must put on a show for the guests. Jewish tradition said it long before these seasoned bridal consultants did: it's a mitzvah for guests to bring joy to the newlyweds and not the newlyweds' responsibility to bring joy to the guests.

This is a tradition that goes back literally to the very beginning of weddings: the midrash describes Adam and Eve at their wedding being entertained by their one and only guest – God himself!

It's superfluous for the host bride and groom to attempt to recreate either Versailles or Studio 54 in order to satisfy their guests, since in either case, some will always prefer the other.

In the Jewish tradition, guests must come into the wedding hall prepared to answer the following question: how can I give the bride and groom the most perfect, spectacular and memorable event?

It doesn't matters if there will be separate seating, or if the music is up to par. I, the honoured guest, am responsible for making this night as special for them as I can.

It's time to talk about God

CLASS ACT
By Daniel Held

On several occasions, I have used this column as a forum to bemoan my perception of our synagogues' inability to engage adolescents and young adults. My comments have been met both by applause and consternation, garnering letters to the editors, personal e-mails and countless meetings.

I'm not the only one who is concerned for the future of synagogues.

Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union for Reform Judaism noted: "All of us – rabbis, cantors, lay leaders – seem ready to admit that far too often our services are tedious, predictable and dull. Far too often our members pray without fervour or concentration. Far too often, our music is dirge-like and our Torah readings lifeless, and we are unable to trigger true emotion and ascent."

In a similar vein, a Conservative rabbi wrote in the journal Sh'ma that, "like the majority of American Jews, despite my personal commitment to tradition, I had simply decided to write off synagogue involvement." And Rabbi Zvi Hersh Weinreb wrote in the Forward that Orthodox services often lack "emotional power," leaving them "arid and numb."

Looking at attendance on an average Shabbat, let alone a weekday service, it's clear that only a tiny percentage of Jews are engaged by synagogue services.

During a seminar on synagogue innovation and transformation, a rabbi of a large congregation recently boasted that 200 members fill his sanctuary each Shabbat. Rabbi Lawrence Hoffman, who was running the seminar retorted, "What does the figure 200 attendees out of 3,000 congregants mean? [It amounts to] seven per cent of the 30 per cent of all Jews who claim an affiliation, [a] figure equivalent to only two per cent of the total population. Only one person out of every 50 Jews" attends synagogue weekly.

The numbers seem bleak and, while our synagogues are experimenting with innovative ways to engage young people, they have not yet hit the nail on the head. For the majority of Jews, we haven't been able to foster a consistent religious or spiritual commitment to synagogue life.

I've recently come to the realization, however, that shuls can't take all the blame.

We don't know how to talk about God.

I'm the product of a strong day school education, a rich journey through Jewish camps, travel programs, seminars, and Shabbatonim, and a home committed to Jewish values, observance and religious life. Notwithstanding this deep and multifaceted Jewish education, I don't remember ever having a conversation about belief in God.

In school, God showed up when learning Torah. God told Moshe and the children of Israel to do all kinds of things, but God never spoke to me. At camp, I have vivid memories of activities about the Dreyfus trial, Tisha b'Av and the Jewish life cycle, but God was never part of the conversation. At home, we were meticulous about kashrut and sang zmirot at Shabbat meals, but I don't remember broaching the topic of belief.

In many ways, we're too focused on deed to worry about creed and, therefore, have lost the language to speak about God. We teach our children how to light Shabbat candles and to separate meat and milk, but we don't discuss with them our personal beliefs, nor do we challenge them to form their own theology. The few time we enact God's name – in reading Torah, prayer, or the occasional utterance of "God forbid" or "Baruch Hashem" – are merely idioms of functionary etiquette lacking a theological basis.

If conversations about God – no matter the theological perspective or the level of doubt or disbelief – don't take place at home, school or camp, how can we expect to raise a community that's conscious of the religious facets of Judaism? While Jewish film festivals or Birthright Israel trips may continue to overflow, how can we expect to fill the pews of the synagogue if God isn't part of the conversation?

While at times it may be scary or uncomfortable, it's time to talk frankly about God.

Jewish Life

A time to help others

Unity is a subject that is central to Jewish life and culture, and is of interest to many prominent Jewish scholars.

Adam Berktin, a student at the University of Ottawa and a member of the Jewish fraternity AEPi – has been attempting to bring Jewish students in Ottawa, and beyond, together through his work with Chabad Ottawa and AEPi.

ON CAMPUS
By Justin Dahan

"We are at a time now when Jews all over the world need to act as leaders, take a step out of their daily life routine, and light a spark in someone else's life" he said.

He added that we should become role models. "Give a phone call to someone you don't see very much – the small things make the biggest difference," he urged.

Berktin is not asking for much. He is not asking his fellow Jews to move mountains. He just believes strongly in understanding between fellow Jews. It is through this understanding that the biggest goals can be attained, he believes.

But there are many obstacles in the way, he said. "Perhaps the stresses of life and getting caught up in our daily life, whether it be school, at work. Life always gives us challenges to overcome, and although we may not understand them, they're there for us to overcome and [to] accomplish what seems impossible. It is what seems impossible that is the most worthy to overcome," he said.

One of Berktin's mentors is Rabbi Chaim Boyarsky of Chabad Student Network – Ottawa, whose example he tries to follow.

As much as Berktin attempts to follow through on his ideals, he said, even he needs to work harder. "By trying my best to set an example and show how beautiful a simple act of kindness can be… although I may not be the best at it, there are many others who definitely are," he said about his Chabad mentor.

I spoke to Berktin on the eve of a recent event called The Light of Mumbai, held at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre in Ottawa.

Speakers at the event that was open to the community talked about the tragedy that occurred in Mumbai, India, a year ago last month. People worldwide were horrified when they learned that Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg; his wife, Rivka, who was five months pregnant, and four other people were murdered in a terrorist attack on the Mumbai Chabad Centre.

Guest speaker Rabbi Mendel Kaplan said, "If young boys can do such evil, why can't the opposite hold true?"

These words struck a chord with Berktin, and they inspired him.

The Jewish population can become strong through unity, which will keep everyone laughing together in good times but also crying together during hard times. It is through this that we will grow.

Berktin and many others are participating in this movement to unify Jews.

He spoke of many different ways to help spread joy to others, including through tzedakah and mitzvahs.

Remember, this is just the beginning, he said about the mitzvah of lighting Shabbat candles. "One quick light equals one light in this world."

Fire safety and the Jewish home

Chanukah is almost upon us and that means over a period of eight nights, most Jewish homes will burn 44 flames per menorah. While the beauty of flickering lights is undeniable, so is the danger posed by open fire. Although Chanukah is so closely identified with fire, practically every Jewish holiday has a connection to fire.

Maccabee Aish calls itself "the first organization dedicated to fire safety and prevention, offering educational programming to address the needs of the Jewish community." Before reading the advice, it's worth taking time looking at some recent, sobering news stories about tragedies that could have been prevented.

• The Baltimore Fire Department reported that a kitchen fire early Saturday morning was caused by a sheet metal covering (blech) placed on the stovetop.

• A Hollywood, Fla., mother trying to set fire to a piece of bread as part of a centuries-old Jewish ritual accidentally burned her three-year-old son, authorities said.

• A seven-month-old boy sleeping in a crib was killed when a fire ripped through the top floor of his family's Brooklyn home. Investigators believe the blaze was sparked by a faulty timer that was rigged to an air conditioner in the baby's third-floor room during the Sukkot holiday.

Maccabee Aish has a wealth of practical information, including downloadable posters geared to all the major Jewish holidays and brochures for teachers, parents and kids. [jewishfireprevention.org]

Here's advice for fire safety as we move through the Jewish calendar.

• Shabbat: When lighting and blessing candles, women need to insure that they do not accidentally set their sleeves on fire when they put their hands over the flames. [bit.ly/jfire1]

• Sukkot: Do not place high-wattage lights next to schach or anything else flammable. [bit.ly/jfire2]

• Chanukah: Do not light "school project" menorahs made from materials that can burn (wood, plastic, etc.)

• Purim: Do not carry caps, loaded cap guns or fireworks in your pocket. They may ignite and cause serious burn injuries. [bit.ly/jfire3]

• Passover: While searching for chametz, keep the candle away from all flammable objects, especially curtains, sofas and tablecloths. [bit.ly/jfire4]

The New York Fire Department has published its own information sheets in English [bit.ly/jfire5] and Yiddish geared toward the Jewish community. [bit.ly/jfire6]

The department advises that when cooking you should "have a pot lid and container of baking soda handy to smother a pan fire. Do not use water." I never really understood how water could spread a fire until I saw the online video of someone at a chametz-burning ceremony who used water to douse a fire that was getting out of control. Luckily, nobody was injured. [bit.ly/jfire7]

And then there is the food. Dr. Suzanne Schwartz, a former Burn Fellow at New York Hospital-Cornell Medical Center, points out that food poses another serious hazard particularly for observant families. "There is usually intense kitchen activity in preparation for Sabbath and holiday meals – an average of 18 meals during the three week High Holiday season alone. Keeping that food warm during Sabbath and holidays involves any combination of devices, including an urn and Crock-pot – each with an electrical cord, a blech on the stovetop, or a warming tray." [bit.ly/jfire8] Proper procedures are detailed on the same webpage.

Soon after moving into the Jewish quarter of Jerusalem's Old City, Chaya Malka Abramson woke up one night to find her apartment engulfed in flames. While saving her two young children and her grandmother, Abramson sustained second- and third-degree burns on 85 per cent of her body. She beat the odds and survived, and then went on to found the Chaya Malka Burn Foundation and the WhoByFire.net website. The site has practical advice such as the following: "When making latkes, remember to turn frying pan handles away from the edge of the stove, so that they do not get knocked over and cause the oil to be spilled." As well, there are both cautionary and inspirational stories about people who have sustained severe burns. [bit.ly/jfire9]

Have a happy and safe holiday.

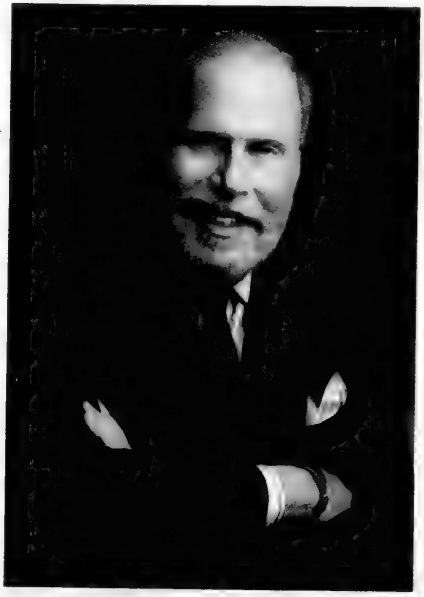
Unique partnership with donors key to UJA Federation success

Philanthropy expert impressed with Jewish Toronto's sense of community



Dr. Jeffrey R. Solomon

By Daniel Horowitz

According to one expert, much of the success enjoyed by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto – year in and year out – is because it was the first North American Jewish Federation to fully comprehend the changes to the philanthropic landscape close to a decade ago.

So says Dr. Jeffrey R. Solomon, President of the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies and a man who provides professional leadership to its philanthropic efforts in Canada, Israel and the United States. Previously, he served as the Senior Vice President and Chief Operating Officer of UJA-Federation of New York.

"UJA Federation of Greater Toronto was on top of the changing trends in philanthropy, and got ahead of those trends while others were still trying to catch up," said Dr. Solomon who recently addressed the audience at UJA Federation's Annual General Meeting. "These new trends really started around eight or ten years ago – around the time that UJA's Tomorrow Campaign started – and what Toronto does so well, and understands so well, is that they act as advisors to Jewish philanthropists who have a vision and who want to truly make a difference in the life of their community."

The Tomorrow Campaign – originally known as Jewish Toronto Tomorrow when it was launched at Toronto's Kiever Shul in April, 2000 saw – UJA match donors with specific projects close to their heart.

Jewish Toronto has not looked back since.

"As long as Toronto continues to treat their donors as equal, respected partners, this trend and success in Jewish Toronto will continue," said Dr. Solomon. "Toronto Federation is not the norm of Federations; they and their donors enjoy a mutually beneficial relationship together. It's a win-win situation."

Dr. Solomon – the author of over 70 publications including his most recent: The Art of Giving: Where the Soul Meets the Business Plan, which he co-authored with Charles Bronfman, counts Jewish Toronto when discussing the elite group of North American Jewish communities.

"Toronto is one of the few Jewish communities in North America which continues to grow," he explained. "There are many reasons for this growth including the magnetism of the city itself; the quality of life which is an attraction especially for younger people. Also, from day one, Toronto's Federation understood the enormous potential of Birthright Israel as a connecting vehicle, and it was one of the first Federations to create programs that reach out to Birthright Israel alumni which are designed to keep that momentum going, and that connection to the Jewish community, strong."

A visitor to Toronto on many occasions - one thing that always impresses Dr. Solomon about our community is just that, our community.

"You can't help but notice Jewish Toronto's strong sense of community," he said. "And that's a factor that you must never take for granted. You must continue to do what you've been doing; build for the future and always be optimistic about that future and have vision. That is what Toronto does so well. Some communities deal with today by doing less; but Toronto continues to do more."

Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit set to break ROM attendance records

By Sally Szuster

The Royal Ontario Museum (ROM) recently revealed that its exhibition of the Dead Sea Scrolls has so far attracted over 200,000 visitors. The exhibition featuring the ancient biblical texts is poised to become the most successful exhibition in the museum's respected history by the time it closes on January 3. Last week the museum announced that it will extend the exhibition's hours to accommodate eager visitors to the museum.

"We are deeply grateful for the support of Toronto's vibrant Jewish community for our exhibition of the Dead Sea Scrolls," William Thorsell, Director & CEO, Royal Ontario Museum explained.

The Dead Sea Scrolls were headline news not only for their historical value and contributions to Judaism, Christianity and Islam, but also for the attempts of anti-Israel activists who claimed that Israel had no right to the artifacts. They launched a campaign to have the ROM cancel the exhibition. A call to the community to purchase tickets and encourage their friends to do the same was issued by UJA Federation and, in the first weekend of the advocacy campaign, over 700 tickets were sold to members of Toronto's Jewish community alone.

"The success of the ROM's Dead Sea Scrolls exhibition reflects not only the wonderful job they did along with the Israel Antiquities Authority to bring these artifacts to life, but demonstrates their shared belief that these scrolls should be available to the broadest of audiences," said David Spiro, Chair of UJA's Committee on Public Affairs. "Those who tried to stop the exhibition are the same people who attempted, among other things, to exclude Israeli artists from being celebrated at the most recent Toronto International Film Festival. These scurrilous campaigns were, and will continue to be, defeated because decent people everywhere understand the fundamental dishonesty of efforts to demonize and isolate Israel. Toronto's Jewish community should be proud to have played a leading role in the failure of such misguided campaigns."

The Dead Sea Scroll exhibit at the Royal Ontario Museum has already attracted over 200,000 visitors.

The exhibit also brought internationally respected Dead Sea Scrolls scholars to Toronto for a historic conference, supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to explore the key issues at the heart of current research on the Scrolls and ancient Judaism.

"The conference was a great success. The events were attended by scholars, students and community members," said Hindy Najman, Chair of Jewish Studies, University of Toronto and one of the conference organizers.

"The scrolls represent a vital part of Jewish history and Jewish presence in Israel and our community has been enriched by this wonderful exhibition," said Alan Winer, Chair, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Ticket discounts are available when purchasing online by using the code IAA. For tickets go to http://www.rom.on.ca/scrolls.

Sharansky cautions Jewish young people about false choices

Chairman of Jewish Agency is keynote speaker at UJA dinner

By Howard English

One of the Jewish world's most respected and admired champions is warning that anti-Semitism is a global danger.

"The fact that so many people in the free world are involved in anti-Semitism is a warning for the free world," said Natan Sharansky, speaking recently at a dinner for United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto's major donors.

Sharansky served 10 years in prison as an advocate of freedom for Soviet Jewry before moving to Israel, starting his own political party and becoming a cabinet minister. He resigned from the government of then Prime Minister Ariel Sharon because he disagreed with the unilateral Gaza disengagement. Today, Sharansky is chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel, which among its many other activities, was responsible for bringing more than a million Jews from the former Soviet Union to Israel, supported by the Jewish Federation network.

When he was fighting for the rights of Soviet Jews, said Sharansky, he was asked to choose "between universal human rights and the rights of our people."

"Then and now, it's a false and dangerous choice," he said.

Sharansky is worried that many Jewish young people are abandoning Jewish pride and Jewish identity in favour of justice, freedom and democracy. "It was very clear to me that these two paths were interconnected," he said. "All the power to fight for freedom comes from our people."

Even more troubling for Sharansky is the attempt by Israel's enemies to use the choice between justice and Jewish identity to "delegitimize Israel and weaken the connection between Israel and the Jewish people." When Jews feel they must abandon their identity in order to embrace universal human rights it's a "big victory for our enemies," he added.

"Our enemies have succeeded a lot in trying to delegitimize us," he said.

However, Sharansky sees significant hope for the future through thousands of Jewish young people who have participated in Birthright Israel trips and longer term MASA experiences in Israel, both supported through funds raised by UJA.

"The fact that they want to visit Israel when they're told every day that Israel is a war criminal is a source of optimism," he said.

In a one-on-one question and answer session with Canadian Senator Linda Frum Sokolowski, Sharansky praised UJA Federation of Greater Toronto as one of the world's strongest supporters of Israel and the Jewish Agency.

The dinner, chaired by David Matlow and Carol Mitchell, was a UJA Campaign 2010 event. The campaign has already raised over $46 million.

Campaign donations can be made at www.ujadonations.com or by calling 416.631.5705.

Dr. Arnold "Bucky" Epstein z"l led by example

By Dan Horowitz

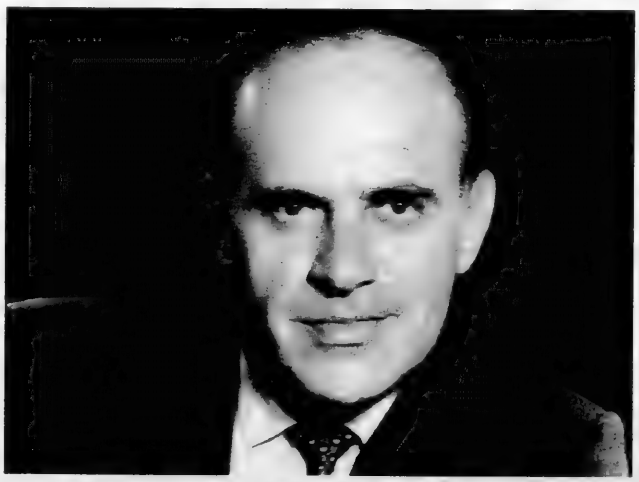
There are those who are born natural leaders; the type of people who posseses a unique charisma and magnetism that instantly draw others to them.

Dr. Arnold Epstein was such a man. Known as "Bucky" by his legion of friends and associates, Dr. Epstein left a void in Toronto's Jewish community when he passed away on November 19, 2009.

The loving husband of Madeleine, father of Susan and Merryl, grandfather of Lyndsey and Sari and great-grandfather of Ava, Dr. Epstein also cared greatly for his community. He served as UJA Federation's Annual Campaign chair in 1957; President of the United Jewish Welfare Fund of Toronto in 1965-66; President of Holy Blossom Temple from 1962 to 1965; President of the Canadian Friends of Haifa University, and was honoured, along with Madeleine, by JNF at their Negev Dinner in 1982.

In appreciation of his remarkable dedication to Jewish Toronto, UJA Federation presented Dr. Epstein with the Ben Sadowski Award of Merit, the organization's highest and most prestigious award for voluntarism.

"In many ways, Bucky Epstein was a larger than life figure," says UJA Federation's Steve Ain, who knew Dr. Epstein well. "He was gregarious, charming, generous and a natural leader. Whether it was at Holy Blossom, UJA Federation or Oakdale Golf Club, people wanted to be with Bucky. For more than 20 years, he and Madeleine attended General Assemblies, not because they had communal leadership positions, but just to renew the countless friendships they had made with dozens of leaders from across North America. We were blessed to have him for many years, and now his memory will be a blessing forever."



"Bucky" Epstein z"l

Born in New Waterford, Nova Scotia, Dr. Epstein graduated from Dalhousie Medical School and obtained his degree in Radiology from the University of Toronto Medical School. He served in the Canadian Armed Forces during the Second World War as a Major in the Medical Corp.

"Responsibility was central to his personal, professional and communal life," said Rabbi Dow Marmur, Rabbi Emeritus, Holy Blossom Temple, in his eulogy. "It defined him as a human being, a citizen and a Jew. Because it was so genuine, he inspired others without having to preach at them. He didn't have to be a politician to be recognized as a leader. He led by example and made others want to emulate him. The esteem in which he was held testifies to it."

Al Jazeera gets go-ahead to broadcast

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada's broadcasting regulator last week announced that the English-language service of the Al Jazeera satellite news network has been approved for distribution in Canada.

Al Jazeera English (AJE) can now be picked up by Canadian digital television providers, the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) ruled. "The commission notes the substantial support for the addition of AJE to the digital lists and considers that AJE will expand the diversity of editorial points of view in the Canadian broadcasting system. Further, despite concerns expressed by certain parties, there is nothing on the record of the current proceeding that leads the commission to conclude that AJE would violate Canadian regulations, such as those regarding abusive comment," the CRTC decision stated.

Al Jazeera English is an international news service available 24 hours a day in more than 100 countries. The network's sister broadcaster, Al Jazeera Arabic (AJA), was approved for distribution in 2004 on the condition that its content be closely monitored because of concerns over its broadcasting of "hateful language." As a result of the onerous conditions, no Canadian cable or satellite distributor has picked up AJA.

In submissions to the CRTC prior to the approval, Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada took no position on whether Al Jazeera English should be granted a broadcasting licence. The two organizations did indicate they were concerned about potential violations of Canadian broadcasting policy by the Qatari-owned network.

HonestReporting Canada, however, argued AJE should be subject to the same conditions as the Arabic-language network, because "on different occasions in the past, AJE's reporting has proven to be unfair, inaccurate and unbalanced."

The station's sponsor, the Ethnic Channels Group Ltd. (ECGL), told the commission during its deliberations that AJE had agreed to consult with Jewish community representatives at least twice a year, that AJE "would not convey anti-Semitic content and the Qatari government [which owns Al Jazeera] would not interfere with the content of the service."

Congress CEO Bernie Farber said that after viewing AJE's broadcasts "it became clear to us that AJE is not like AJA" and doesn't broadcast the kind of blatant anti-Semitic and Holocaust-denial content that can be found in its Arabic counterpart. Farber acknowledged AJE was often critical of Israel – but so are other outlets in the mainstream media, he said.

"All this said, we are very wary that the albatross around the neck of AJE is the parent [Al Jazeera Arabic] that has a vile history of anti-Semitic programming. We remain watchful."

Last February, Congress was approached by AJE managing director Tony Burman to discuss its concerns. B'nai Brith also met with AJE, and the two organizations agreed to join a liaison group that will consult with AJE on a regular basis.

Burman, former CBC News editor-in-chief, told the National Post he expected AJE to be available to Canadians early in 2010. He also said the network, which opens "a unique window on a fascinating world," planned to open a Canadian bureau.

Mike Fegelman, executive director of HonestReporting Canada, said, "We still have concerns about AJE's editorial independence from its Arabic counterpart, along with apprehensions that reporting about Israel and the Middle East might be unfair and may potentially contain inaccurate and unbalanced content. As an organization that is strongly supportive of a broad marketplace of ideas, we never opposed AJE's application for carriage, but we did bring our concerns to the CRTC's attention, and we still believe the network should be monitored very closely to ensure that it adheres to the CRTC's regulations."

CRTC's decision to grant Al Jazeera English a license wasn't unanimous. Commissioner Marc Patrone registered a dissenting opinion, saying concerns over AJA's broadcasts, contained in the commission's 2004 decision, should have prompted a comprehensive investigation of Al Jazeera's entire record.

"In this case, the potential use of our broadcast system to spread ethnic or religious hatred are too important to submit strictly to current regulatory convention," he wrote.

Patrone suggested ECGL is in no position to assure that the Qatari government would maintain a hands-off policy regarding the English service, and the CRTC has few tools to enforce its regulations against a foreign entity.

"I find the whole view… that a 'linguistic firewall' exists between the two services unrealistic to say the least. The sharing of resources, be they 'video' story ideas, tips, scripts, 'live hits' or otherwise, between services operated by one ownership group is standard operating practice wherever I've worked, and I imagine they are no different at Al Jazeera," he stated.

Campaign pledges down

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The Combined Jewish Appeal's campaign pledges are down by some $3.5 million this year, but organizers say the results are good, given the economic climate.

At its campaign closing event last week, CJA announced that it expects to raise $36,558,557 for 2009. In addition, another $3,589,574 in one-time and designated donations are also expected, which will be spent locally and in Israel.

The results are down from the 2008 campaign, in which total pledges for the main campaign topped $40 million.

"This represents a significant achievement under very difficult economic circumstances," Federation CJA president Jack Hasen said of the 2009 results. "I want to commend our donors for their generosity and our volunteers for their dedication.

"Despite the anxieties many feel with regard to their own situation, the community responded generously to our campaign and remains determined to support our efforts to help the most vulnerable. Once again, the Montreal community has proven that it is among the most generous in the entire Jewish world."

More than 18,000 gifts were made this year to CJA, which officially launched its campaign in August.

The hundreds of volunteers attending the closing event Nov. 25 brought toys which will be included in Chanukah baskets for distribution to needy families.

Tory pro-Israel flyer hurt Cotler, speaker rules

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Liberal Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler's reputation and ability to perform his parliamentary duties have been adversely affected by a Conservative Party flyer that disparages the Liberal Party's record on Israel and anti-Semitism, House of Commons Speaker Peter Milliken ruled last week.

"In my view, the end result was a negative effect that spilled over to the member for Mount Royal in a very direct and personal way," Milliken said in the House Nov. 26, namely, that it is "damaging to his reputation and his credibility."

Milliken emphasized that it's not for him to comment on the accuracy of the claims made in the publicly funded flyers that were mailed out last month as so-called "10 per centers." Conservative MPs sent them to certain households in Liberal ridings across the country that have significant Jewish populations, including Mount Royal.

Irwin Cotler

However, Milliken said he has "no difficulty concluding that any reasonable person reading the mailing in question, and this would, of course, include the constituents of Mount Royal, would have likely been left with an impression at variance with the member's longstanding and well-known positions on these matters."

The ruling sparked a two-hour debate in the House.

On Nov. 19, Cotler had raised the matter as a question of privilege, his first in his 10 years as MP. He was supported by the New Democratic Party and Bloc Québécois, as well as Liberal MPs Stéphane Dion and Joe Volpe.

Cotler is seeking an apology to the Liberals and to himself, and a written apology, at the Conservative party's expense, to each household that received the flyer in the country. He also thinks the party should reimburse the full expense of the flyers' mailing, which was supported by public funds.

Cotler called the flyers' content "false and misleading," as well as "slanderous, damaging and prejudicial" to the Liberal Party and himself. The flyers make comparisons between the Liberals' and Conservatives' action on support for Israel, combating anti-Semitism and policy on terrorist groups.

Cotler isn't mentioned in the flyers, Citizenship Minister Jason Kenney pointed out.

The House was scheduled to vote on Monday on a motion by Cotler that the matter be referred to the standing committee on procedure and house affairs to determine if a breach of privilege has occurred.

The Liberal tactic has moved the focus off Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff, whom the flyer states charged in 2006 that Israel had committed war crimes in its conflict with Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Cotler finds particularly "cruel" the flyers' allegation that the Liberals "willingly participated in the overtly anti-Semitic Durban I."

He said that 2001 United Nations conference against racism in Durban, South Africa, has become "a metaphor for virulent anti-Semitism" among Jews in his riding.

"Accordingly, to identify any political party, let alone a Jewish MP, with willingly participating in such an anti-Semitic event is a most loathsome and dangerous accusation that one could make against that party and that member."

He said that some constituents have asked him "to leave Parliament, to in fact even leave the Jewish community, as I had betrayed that community… They have asked me how I could remain with a party that is anti-Semitic, or how, as a Jew, I could be engaging in such self-hatred."

Jason Kenney

Cotler also maintained that it is "presumptuous" that Canadian Jews vote solely on issues of Jewish concern and that it's possibly a violation of privacy to single out Jewish households.

Kenney responded that Volpe, the MP for the Toronto riding of Eglinton-Lawrence several weeks ago circulated "10 per centers" arguing that his party's record on Jewish issues is better than that of the government, and that these mailings appear to have gone to areas with large Jewish populations.

Kenney rejected as "spurious" the "terribly mistaken inference" that Cotler draws from the Conservative flyer that it alleges that he or any other Liberal member is anti-Semitic. "This is clearly outrageous," he said.

"The fact that the previous government decided to take part in Durban, knowing full well the atmosphere of anti-Semitism that surrounded it, and the member [Cotler] knows very well because he was there, is a statement of fact."

He continued that his government was the first in the world to withdraw from the Durban II follow-up conference this year. "Now that in my judgment is a legitimate policy difference, and that is what public debate involves."

On Nov. 23, an open letter with close to 120 signatories was sent to Prime Minister Stephen Harper asking for the immediate removal of the flyers from circulation.

The signatories say the flyer tries to portray the Liberal Party as anti-Semitic and not supportive of Israel.

"We find it highly disturbing that any party or parliamentarian would attempt to use Israel as a wedge to divide the Jewish community and, indeed, Canadians, for partisan gain… Support for Israel should not be portrayed as exclusive to one party."

It notes that the Canadian delegation remained at Durban I at "the specific request of the Israeli government."

A majority of the signatories – who include former cabinet minister Elinor Caplan, former senators Yoine Goldstein and Leo Kolber, lawyer David Matas, former CBC head Robert Rabinovitch, businessman Stephen Bronfman and Toronto school trustee Josh Matlow – appear to be Jewish, and some are identifiable as Liberals or party supporters.

On Nov. 26, Harper's parliamentary secretary Pierre Poilievre, the minister of intergovernmental affairs, told The CJN the government has no intention of withdrawing the flyers. He dismissed the letter as being written by Liberals "who are angry that their party's record on the Middle East is being brought to the attention of Canadians… These are just the facts."

AP sets standard with balanced reporting

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The recent announcement that Israel intended to build 900 housing units in the Jerusalem neighbourhood of Gilo was met with the most critical Canadian coverage not in the Toronto Star or Globe and Mail, but rather in the National Post.

A Nov. 18 Post front page story headlined "Obama criticizes Israeli plan to expand," by Daily Telegraph reporter Adrian Blomfield, began: "U.S. President Barack Obama warned Israel yesterday that a plan to build 900 homes for Jewish settlers in predominantly Arab east Jerusalem could prove dangerous by provoking the Palestinians."

True, in reference to Gilo, Obama strongly objected to what he termed "additional settlement building." This was emphasized by National Post editors, who printed the quote over a prominent photo of Gilo.

In an accompanying article on an inside page, titled "U.S. Tough talk Is Mere Bluster," Lachlan Carmichael of Agence France-Presse wrote that the housing units are to be built "in annexed east Jerusalem," adding that "Obama said such moves make it harder for the Jewish state to make peace with its neighbours and ensure its own security."

Both stories, however, omit the Israeli perspective on Gilo, which provides a different view of its status and importance to the peace process.

There is a virtual consensus in Israel that Gilo, with a population of about 40,000, is an integral neighbourhood in southwest Jerusalem – not a settlement. Even left-leaning Israelis who oppose settlement activity in the West Bank do not look at Gilo, or other such developments in Jerusalem, such as Ramot in the northwest, in the same way. They know that during the negotiations at Camp David and Taba (2000-2001), it was understood that Jewish neighbourhoods would remain under Israeli control and Palestinian neighbourhoods would move to Palestinian control, but Jerusalem would not be physically redivided. That is why the announcement of more housing in Gilo did not elicit any reaction in Israel – in contrast to the outrage expressed abroad.

Contrary to the Post's focus on "settlers" and "settlement," the Associated Press (AP), which describes itself as the world's largest news agency, has adopted neutral terminology in this case, reflecting a desire to balance the competing Israeli and Palestinian narratives.

For example, an AP report that ran on CTV.ca (Nov. 17) began by describing plans to build 900 more "housing units" in a "Jewish neighbourhood" in "the part of Jerusalem claimed by Palestinians."

While AP pointedly avoided the term "settlement," this unfortunately was not reflected in ctv.ca's own choice of headline over the AP report: "Israeli plan to expand settlement comes under fire." (Readers might understandably be confused about the different terminology and what it signifies.)

AP also paid attention to previous Israeli-Palestinian understandings, writing: "In past peace negotiations that broke down without agreement, formulas have been raised to allow Israel to keep its new Jerusalem neighbourhoods, while Palestinians would receive control of Arab sections of the city and land from Israel to compensate for the neighbourhoods and West Bank settlements Israel would keep."

AP might be unusual among western news sources in its balanced and judicious use of terms, in addition to its appreciation of the role of Jerusalem in the peace process. But its careful, level-headed appreciation of basic facts sets the standard for other editors to follow.

The public relations problem that Israel continues to face, though, is that we live in a world where perceptions matter more than facts.

A conflict that has been intensifying in Yemen involving Saudi Arabia, (allegedly) Iran and even possibly Hezbollah has gone almost entirely unmentioned by the Canadian media. One exception was the Nov. 24 Globe and Mail, which ran a Reuters report under the headline, "Saudis bomb rebel targets inside Yemen."

The conflict has important regional implications, given Shiite Iran's increasing efforts to spread its influence and power into the Sunni-dominated Arab states, while Saudi Arabia works to thwart it

The Globe story mentions only the Saudi bombing of rebel Houthis in northern Yemen. However, European media have reported allegations that Iran has been supplying weapons to the Houthis, who have also received training in Hezbollah camps in Lebanon.

A long-standing tribal rebellion in Yemen is being taken advantage of by outside radicals. Because of its broader regional implications, this is a story that deserves greater attention.

SACH helping to 'build bridges'

After visiting the families, the visitors insisted on "having a walkabout" in downtown Nablus, Goldman said, adding that they weren't afraid. "We felt quite calm. It looked like east Jerusalem in the days when everything was OK."

They took pictures of new buildings and local markets, with women in the background wearing headscarves – some with traditional dress, others clad in jeans.

Although one of their photos from the trip shows obviously political artwork in a home they visited – a mural of a woman in a keffiyah, with her hand forming the "V" for victory sign, embracing the old city of Jerusalem – Diamond said that it was "so evident" that the people they met there "just want to live their lives."

But she also hopes that families who have been helped by SACH "will raise a generation of children who have positive feelings for Israelis" who have saved their lives.

In addition to helping children medically, "we talk about building bridges," Goldman said.

SACH is based at the Wolfson Medical Center in Holon, where medical staff donate their time to the project. It's also the site of a weekly clinic for children from the West Bank and Gaza. Children from Iraq are seen in Amman, Jordan.

Since its inception in 1996, SACH has saved the lives of more than 2,200 children from 36 different countries.

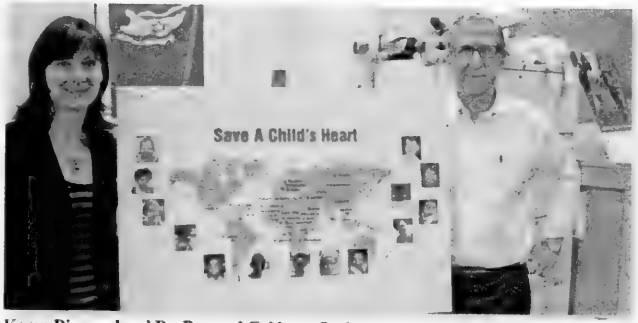
SACH Canada sends more than $250,000 annually to the organization, mostly to fund surgery, which costs about $10,000 per child. As well, some of the funding goes to educational missions in countries like China and Ethiopia, where doctors from the organization work with a local team.

While in Israel, board members also visited the SACH children's house in Azur, near Holon, where visiting families stay as long as a month or more for pre- and post-operative care, and handed out plush toys donated by the Webkinz Foundation.

At the house, they saw children from Angola, Gaza, the West Bank, Ghana, Iraq, Kenya and Romania – 22 in all.

A new children's home, on land donated by the municipality of Holon, will replace the existing one. It's expected to be completed by mid-2011.

The visitors also met a fourth patient from Nablus, the 1,000th Palestinian child to receive life-saving treatment from SACH. Gaida Nofal, 12, had open heart surgery in July to correct a serious congenital heart condition, and is the subject of a new SACH video, "1,000 Palestinian Child."



Karen Diamond and Dr. Bernard Goldman flank a map and pictures showing the extent of Save a Child's Heart work in helping children with congenital heart problems.

Chassidic property seized for back taxes

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The chassidic Belz community is contesting the loss in a bailiff's sale Nov. 18 of most of the property it owned in the Laurentian village of Val Morin for decades and used as a summer resort.

The village seized the property because it says the community had not paid municipal taxes for two years and was in arrears of more than $17,500, plus almost $16,700 in fines.

Belz community spokesperson Yankel Binet said the community's lawyer, Sébastien Dorion, filed a contestation in court at the end of last week.

Binet said the community was behind in paying its taxes and had received a bill of $34,000 and a lawyer's letter last February. At the point, he said the community issued nine post-dated cheques to pay off the sum in monthly instalments.

"They then said that we had to pay of the sum at once, but they continued to deposit the cheques. Our lawyer tells us that means they were accepting our payment. They can't have it both ways. By the time of the sale, there was only about $4,000 owing. It's despicable," Binet said.

Val Morin bought about three-quarters of the property, consisting of eight houses, plus a synagogue, a swimming pool and a large vacant lot bordering the river, for $160,000. The rest was purchased by an individual for $47,750.

That's about one-quarter of the municipal evaluation of $831,000. The property totals almost 250,000 square feet. No representative of the community showed up for the sale.

The community is left with only a school and a few other buildings. The bailiff will give the proceeds of the sale to the community, after deducting the taxes and fines owed and the court and other costs.

The municipality's director general, Pierre Delage, said normal procedure was followed.

"When a taxpayer does not pay his taxes, we proceed to a bailiff's sale, after having obtained a judgment before the courts. It's a question of equity toward all taxpayers in Val Morin."

The Belz community and Val Morin have been at loggerheads for some 25 years over the legality of its synagogue and school, which are in houses, as well as over complaints from residents about noise and other disturbances. Last year, the Quebec Court of Appeal ruled the community was violating municipal bylaws by operating these institutions in a residential zone. The community tried to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, but it decided not to hear the case.

History of 11 small communities explored online

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It took about three years to complete, but the Ontario Jewish Archives' virtual exhibit that features the histories of 11 small Ontario Jewish communities has been up and running as of late last month.

The Ontario Small Jewish Communities Virtual Exhibit – which was largely funded by a $117,000 grant awarded to the OJA in 2005 by the Ontario Trillium Foundation, an agency of the Ministry of Culture – is a virtual exhibit put together by historians and researchers who completed 69 oral histories, conducted seven oral history workshops in different cities and towns, and acquired 110 donations in the form of artifacts, documents, photographs and art.

OJA director Ellen Scheinberg said the donated material was scanned and photographed so that it could be viewed on the website alongside 250 pages of text and about 700 digitized documents, maps and video clips.

"We have a provincial mandate, so I wanted to ensure that we were covering the histories of communities outside of Toronto and making them more visible and establishing closer ties, acquiring and safeguarding records from these communities. This project really helped accomplish that," said Scheinberg, adding that the OJA partnered with the Ontario Historical Society and the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario to complete the project.

"A lot of people have the misconception that Canadian Jews only live in big cities like Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver. It's true that the majority do, but many Jews decided to live outside the big cities and pursue occupations in these smaller towns."

The 11 Ontario communities featured in the exhibit are Cornwall, Belleville, Kingston, Peterborough, St. Catharines, Niagara Falls, Kitchener-Waterloo, Owen Sound, North Bay, Sudbury and Thunder Bay.

The communities were selected based on the criteria that they are at least 100 kilometres from Toronto, and have an operating synagogue and a population of less than 2,000 Jews.

Scheinberg said the exception was Cornwall, which had to close its synagogue in 2007 because of a declining Jewish population, but a decision was made not to exclude the community, because it was selected before the closure, and because of its rich history.

Scheinberg said the decision to put the exhibit on the Internet rather than produce a physical one was made so that the information could reach people all over the world.

"Because the communities are situated so far apart from one another, it will enhance communication and they can learn from one another."

She said that at the launch, held last month at the Lipa Green Centre in Toronto, several speakers, including MPP Monte Kwinter and Ontario Trillium Foundation Board director Sharyn Salsberg Ezrin, addressed some 150 people who came from all over the province to attend.

"I did a half-hour demonstration about the site, and I just went through the different towns and sections and tried to show the people all the interesting types of documents and clips that were there and showcase the sophisticated menu screens and links and pop-ups that we included," Scheinberg said.

"They seemed really quite pleasantly surprised, and I think they were amazed at how ambitious it was and how comprehensive."

Scheinberg said the Trillium grant has been used up, but she hopes that with more fundraising, the OJA will be able to add more communities – such as Timmins, Kirkland Lake, Welland and Brantford – to the virtual exhibit.

OJA board chair Brooky Robins grew up in North Bay, so she understands the importance of documenting the Jewish histories of small towns.

"Everything about that small town is my heart and soul. The initiative, not just to me, but to everybody else, brings into focus and gives a much higher visibility and highlights the histories of the small communities and educates the public about the important role that many of them played over the years," said Robins, who was born in North Bay in 1936 and lived there until 1954 before moving to Toronto.

"I think there isn't one person from those 11 communities who were interviewed that weren't extremely excited about what the [OJA] was doing and about the interviews and the initiative."

She said the interviewees responded positively because "people in small communities have never been asked these questions before about their lives there.

"When someone asks you what it was like growing up in a small town, all of a sudden a flood of memories comes back."

Robins recalled that "as a little kid... we used to live on the corner of two major streets," and one of them was the main road that led to the military base in Petawawa, Ont., during World War II.

She said soldiers would stand at the corner of Fisher and Worthington streets to hitchhike to the base.

"Every Friday, my mother would say, 'Brooky, go see if he's Jewish'... So my mother would send me across the street and I would say, 'My mother is cooking Friday night dinner and would you like to come for dinner?'... That's the way we met all these young men during the war."

Robins said anecdotes like that, as well as ones that provide a glimpse into the religious, social and business aspects of small Jewish communities, can be found on the site.

Barrie school vandalized

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

An elementary school in Barrie, Ont. was the latest victim of a string of anti-Semitic graffiti incidents in Canada over the past month.

Johnson Street Public School was vandalized last weekend after a student from the school had a letter published in the Barrie Examiner. In the letter, the student voiced her opinions about her shul, which had been vandalized earlier in November.

The words "brain-washing factory" were written on the school, paired with a swastika and a Star of David, said Len Rudner, the Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario regional director.

"I was informed of this by someone at the synagogue. Clearly people are being much more attentive," he said. "[We're] concerned about the way these things are spreading."

Rudner is unsure if the graffiti is connected to the shul that was vandalized.

"It's difficult to tell. People can be incredibly stupid," he said.

The school called the police, who are currently investigating the incident, said Eileen Carl, Johnson Street's principal, adding that the graffiti was cleaned off by the end of the day last Monday.

"I think [the students] were really quite hurt. We just finished doing a big unit on the Holocaust in the Grade 7 curriculum," she said. "The kids are really disappointed and... disgusted." Other graffiti incidents have also occurred recently in Calgary, Oshawa, Ont., London, Ont., and the Moncton, N.B., area.

N.B. monument defaced

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Members of the Jewish community in Moncton, N.B., are showing little concern over a recent defacement of a local monument built to remember victims of violence.

The monument in Riverview, N.B., a town not far from Moncton, was covered in swastikas and racist slogans. The vandalism comes at a symbolic time, as the monument also commemorates the 14 women who died in the Dec. 6, 1989, massacre at Montreal's École Polytechnique.

"Once in a while, people show anti-Semitism in our community," said Francis Weil, president of Congregation Tiferes Israel and a retired professor at the Université de Moncton who now teaches part time.

"But I was talking to a friend at local cathedral, and he sees more vandalism that we do. There are some groups with weird ideas who are probably not as much anti-Jewish as they are anti-religion."

Jack Haller, a past vice-president of the synagogue and a Moncton lawyer, said he thought the event was a one-time incident directed at the women's monument.

"This happened in suburban Riverview," he noted. "The Moncton Jewish population lives almost entirely in the city of Moncton. We're more concerned about someone who urinated on the shul two weeks ago, an action that was captured on our security cameras. The police have the man's face and are pursuing the case."

The vandalized monument, a round granite slab, was covered in yellow spray paint and a swastika was painted over the peace dove. Parts of the inscription were completely obscured by paint, and someone spray-painted racist slogans on the concrete base. There was so much graffiti in industrial-strength paint that the monument's lettering had to be repainted. The monument was cleaned up quickly after the discovery of the defacement and will be restored in time for a Dec. 6 ceremony at the site.

Rally in Calgary

Calgary's Jewish community was joined by dozens of ethnic, religious and anti-racism organizations last week in a solidarity rally that followed a rash of anti-Semitic incidents.

At least 500 people filled the Archie Boyce Pavilion in a show of support and "to make a statement about the kind of society we want," said Judy Shapiro, community relations director of the Calgary Jewish Community Council (CJCC).

Shapiro said some 30 community groups joined the CJCC in supporting the rally, among them representatives of aboriginal and gay and lesbian groups.

"The way it came about is that following the incidents, there was an unbelievable outpouring of support for the Jewish community," she said.

In addition to the rally, the community was offered free graffiti removal service, flowers were left at a defaced Holocaust memorial and offers were received for free signage to replace defaced signs, she said.

About three weeks ago, graffiti was discovered defacing two shuls, a Chabad centre, a Holocaust memorial, mailboxes and private property. Among the phrases left were, "kill Jews," "six million more," and "F--- Jews."

Doubling Your GIC Returns

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 8% Plus

With interest rates at their lowest level in 40 years and stock markets in the doldrums, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free returned to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield.

The following example, compares the investment of $200,000 invested in a GIC at 5% with an insured annuity, for a male aged 75.

GIC versus Insured Annuity

	GIC	Insured Annuity
Capital	500,000	500,000
Annual Income	25,000	48,167
Taxable Income	25,000	0
Tax (46%)	11,500	0
After Tax Income	13,500	48,167
Insurance Cost	NIL	25,605
Spendable Income	13,500	21,562
Pre-Tax Yield	5%	9.63%
Estate Value	500,000	500,000
Subject to Probate	YES	NO
Guaranteed Period	5 YEARS	LIFE

Annuity Income Postponed until Jan 15, 2010

(This is an illustration only, rates will vary)

Some recent cases closed:
$1,000,000 Annuity — Female, Age 80 - Pre-Tax Yield 10.54%
For the Uninsurable - A Cash Refund Annuity
$1,000,000 Invested. Monthly Income $8153.00; After - Tax Yield 8.15%

Hamilton's 2010 UJA campaign gets off to a good start

By HOLLY GINSLER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — The co-chairs of Hamilton's 2010 UJA Campaign are trying to do some things a little differently this year.

The campaign, which is expected to close by Chanukah, is being run by by two enthusiastic women, Lisa Morris and Danna Horwood, aided by a campaign cabinet of 18 community leaders.

"This year is a new campaign, a new Hamilton. What worked in years gone by does not work now," Morris says.

Their goal is to raise $1.1 million, which represents a five per cent increase over what was raised last year.

"The campaign is going well," Morris says. "We have actually completed 41 per cent [of our goal], which is reflecting a 2.9 per cent increase on a card per card basis."

Horwood is equally upbeat, despite the current recession. "I think last year the recession affected the outcome hugely, but not this year. I think we're moving ahead. I think we're definitely going to surpass our goal this year," she says.

Horwood adds that many of the people who have donated have said they were responding to the fact that she had called them personally. She feels that people are not giving money to as many charities this year but are more willing to donate if they know the person who is asking for the gift, especially if they can learn about where the money is going.

Morris, a lawyer, was past chair of the UJA Women's Campaign. Horwood is the mother of three, volunteers on many boards and runs a peer support group for woman with post-partum depression.

Horwood has also assumed the new UJA leadership role of chair of donor development, responsible for identification, engagement and cultivation of potential donors in the Hamilton area.

Fundraising activities began even before the campaign's official launch on Oct. 18. The first campaign event of 2009 was an event for major donors of previous years on Oct. 14, an evening that included guest speaker Hershell Ezrin, chief executive officer of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA). Ezrin spoke about anti-Semitism, stressing the need for non-Jews to know about the increase in anti-Semitic activity and support the Jewish community's efforts to combat it.

Just before the official campaign opening, a new event, Going for the Gold, was held at Beth Jacob Synagogue. Members of the community were asked to bring in unwanted gold, diamonds and other valuables to be appraised. Participants received cash for their items, with 20 per cent going to help the Jewish community.

"This event is in its infancy," Morris says. "The people that turned out liked the event, started doing word of mouth, and it will get better every year."

The evening campaign opening at Beth Jacob featured two guest speakers: Michael Soberman, national director of the Canada Israel Experience, which sends Canadian young people to Israel on programs such as Birthright Israel and March of the Living; and Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Morris and Horwood are planning an evening cocktail party for those who give $500 and over, and they're also once again having the annual Girlfriends Pyjama Party, which aims to encourage more young people to get involved in the campaign by bringing the young women together for social interaction

A new event this year was an invitation to the community to join Shalom Village residents and their families at the seniors residence on Oct. 25. A group of children provided singing and dancing and an afternoon's entertainment for the residents.

"We didn't want to forget the people that were our grassroots that formed Hamilton as it is today," Morris says.

Insurance firm reverses decision on Israeli travel

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A lawyer who was turned down for his first life insurance policy because he travelled to a supposedly dangerous part of Israel will be issued a policy after all after the company reversed its decision.

Medavie Blue Cross group representative Jean-Pierre Carbonneau told The CJN that the rejection of Dan Goldstein's application was due to the mistake of reinsurers who confused Hebron – which is in disputed territory – with Holon, a Tel Aviv suburb that Goldstein and his family travel to annually.

Reinsurance, Carbonneau explained, is how insurance companies "spread risk" among themselves by, in effect, insuring themselves against too much risk.

"They mistook Holon for Hebron," Carbonneau said of the reinsurers, and "people here [at Medavie Blue Cross] didn't question anything. They turned it down because they thought it was [in] occupied territory."

Goldstein told The CJN last week that he received word from an agent with the insurance brokerage firm of Michel Rhéaume & Associés that Medavie Blue Cross had reversed its decision as of Nov. 16.

Goldstein, 35, will receive life and accidental death insurance, but no-long-term disability coverage due to pre-existing medical conditions.

He requested and obtained from Medavie Blue Cross all the details related to his case based on full disclosure rights in law.

"The truth is that as far as being a [Jewish] community issue or a case of discrimination, that no longer appears to be the case," Goldstein said. "It could have been a real mix-up and source of embarrassment, and it gave them an opportunity to back-track."

Irwin Rudick, president of the Lord Reading Society, comprising Jewish lawyers and jurists, was also satisfied by Medavie Blue Cross' reversal.

The policy Goldstein applied for is offered at preferred rates to all members of the Quebec Bar. Goldstein isn't a Lord Reading member, but the society struck a committee to investigate his case.

"I can tell you that our board was very sympathetic, even though Goldstein doesn't happen to be a member," Rudick said. "We still take an interest in issues affecting Jewish jurists. That was our board's spontaneous feeling about it."

He said Quebec Jewish Congress also monitored the case.

"If there was some kind of misapprehension or misunderstanding and that's been clarified, so much the better," Rudick said. "If there was some kind of mistake in terms of geography and that mistake was rectified, I'm perfectly satisfied by it."

Still, Goldstein could not help wondering whether other elements came into play regarding his application.

The mixing up of place names "could have been an easy excuse to avoid controversy," Goldstein speculated, noting that correspondence he had received contained spelling changes from the incorrect "Holoun" to the corrected "Holon."

"If they figured out how to spell it, they also must have figured out where it was on a map," he said.

Goldstein said his initial application could have been accepted even if it had said "Hebron," because insurance policies often have clauses that deny benefits in the event of "undeclared acts of war," such as terrorism.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Sovereigntist party backs Israel boycott

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The provincial political party Québec solidaire is officially endorsing the boycott campaign against Israel.

At the sovereigntist party's convention, held Nov. 20 to 22, the party adopted a resolution supporting the "boycott, divestment and sanctions" campaign against Israel in an effort to protest its "occupation and colonization" of Palestinian territory and its alleged apartheid policies.

"Let's be clear: this campaign is not directed at Jews… nor the right of Israel's existence in the limits recognized by the United Nations," party president Françoise David said in a press release. "It is to do with only the Israeli policy of occupation, of colonization and of discrimination toward non-Jewish Israelis."

The left-wing Québec solidaire, founded in 2006, elected its first MNA, Amir Khadir, to the National Assembly in December 2008

The Quebec-Israel Committee (QIC) denounced the resolution as "a radical anti-Israel position" not shared by most Quebecers.

Despite David's claims, QIC executive director Luciano Del Negro said the international boycott campaign puts into question "the right of the Jewish people to live in its capital and its millennia-old spiritual centre and to use the holiest site in Judaism: the Western Wall."

The QIC contends that the boycott campaign is promoted by "extremist and marginal" groups in Palestinian society whose goal is the delegitimization of the State of Israel and mistrust between Palestinians and Israelis.

Del Negro said the boycott does nothing to encourage Palestinian moderates, but rather gives comfort to extremists and other groups who do not want peace with Israel.

Class Acts

HELPING CHILDREN: Students at Leo Baeck Day School's south campus at Holy Blossom Temple, took part Nov. 20 in a Free the Children initiative to give a voice to impoverished children. At the beginning of the day, each class got a letter that spelled out "Free the children," and each student decorated the letter by drawing a depiction of their idea of activism. The letters were presented during a special Kabbalat Shabbat service to illustrate the students' thoughts and their commitment to tikkun olam.

Obituary

Painter depicted pre-war Polish life

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Mayer Kirshenblatt, who died on Nov. 20 at age 93, will be remembered for becoming a self-taught artist at age 73.

Born in Opatow, Poland – he emigrated with his family to Toronto in 1934 – he worked in a sweatshop and as a house painter, and opened up his own paint and wallpaper store, before beginning his "second career" depicting Jewish and non-Jewish life in Poland before the war.

Mayer Kirshenblatt

Eventually he collaborated with his daughter, Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, on a a book, They Called me Mayer July: Painted Memories of Jewish Childhood in Poland Before the Holocaust.

He was nicknamed Mayer Tammuz, or Mayer July, as a boy in Poland, because he was known for being hot-headed.

In her eulogy, Kirshenblatt-Gimblett said how fortunate it is that "he has shared those memories for all the world and for all time through his paintings and stories, his book and exhibitions, his blog and Facebook page.

"He graced the lives of so many people with the gift of his memory, his wit and his indomitable spirit."

Her father is the last of the generation born and raised in Poland before the Holocaust, she said. "Mayer's passing marks the end of an era. Surrounded by our memories of him and his memories of a lost universe, we celebrate a life well lived and the precious legacy that he has bequeathed to his family and the world."

Daughter Elaine Silver said that it was a "daunting task to distil a force like our dad into a few phrases. He was certainly larger than life – if not in stature, then in personality.

"We are all in awe of his prodigious memory – his capacity for detail, [and] his ability to describe his memories in such a way as to make us feel we are right there."

She said that he created a lasting chronicle of a lost life in Poland so vividly that "it will set a standard to memorialize lost civilizations and cultures. We can picture his own joy and excitement with his creations. Having started late in life, he made it his mission to capture as much as he could of his childhood and share it with everyone he encountered."

His family, she said, was his "pure pleasure. We're all grateful for any time we spent with him. He was Zaide to all – friends, friends' children, friends' friends – no matter how remote the relationship, he had a particular regard for young people and made sure that they all knew how special they were to him."

Speaking on behalf of Kirshenblatt's grandchildren and great-grandchildren, Corey Brozovsky, husband of granddaughter Lisa Silver, said that "Zaide had infinite curiosity and a love for learning, which he imparted on all of us. He would teach us how to make the toys that he made when he was a kid, and was most proud about having taught everyone how to ride bicycles."

In their eyes, he said, he could accomplish anything. "No task was too daunting, no skill unmasterable. He never felt he was too old to start something new."

Brozovsky said that when their grandmother – Kirshenblatt and his wife, Dora, were married 69 years – began to lose her vision, "Zaide took over household responsibilities, including the cooking. He adapted her [recipes] to include apples. [He made] muffins, soups, salads, all with contraband apples 'borrowed' from the neighbourhood trees. He wouldn't climb the trees. He just collected the ones that had fallen to the ground. He would say that it was a shame to see things go to waste."

Kirshenblatt leaves his wife Dora, and was father and father-in-law to Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett and Max Gimblett; Elaine and Marv Silver; and Daniel and the late Anne Berlin.

Timmins Torah finds new home in Toronto

Ezra Tanen, centre, takes the Torah donated by Michael Feldman out of the ark for Torah reading at TanenbaumCHAT.

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The thought of having a beautiful, 100-year-old Torah tucked away in a dank storage room in Timmins, Ont., didn't sit well with Michael Feldman, the leader of Timmins' now-tiny Jewish community.

But he also didn't want to lose a Torah that has been a part of his family since it was donated by his late grandparents, Joseph and Sheva Martin, in 1938 to celebrate their 50th wedding anniversary.

"The Torah… was not being used. We thought it was such a waste. To me, it was almost sacrilegious. We had a Torah and it was kept in storage," said Feldman.

Now, through United Israel Appeal of Canada (UIAC), the Torah, which had not been used in almost 40 years, has found a home at the Vaughan campus of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy.

Feldman explained that since the B'nai Israel Congregation, the Timmins synagogue, closed in the early 1970s due to a decrease in the town's Jewish population, the Torah was kept in a warehouse owned by the Feldmans.

Although the Timmins Jewish community today is made up of about 15 families, the community has a rich history that dates back to the turn of the 20th century.

The Jews of Timmins arrived in the early 1900s to build railroads that reached the silver mines, lakes and forests. Feldman's grandparents and great-uncles were involved in the contracting and forest work that accompanied the development of mines.

The Martins first arrived in Kruegerdorf, Ont., in 1900 from Russia to work the land and the railroad before they moved to the larger metropolis of Timmins around 1920.

In 1928, the B'nai Israel Congregation was founded and by the early 1930s, the Jewish community had a synagogue.

"In its heyday, Timmins boasted around 150 or 160 families," said Perry Romberg, director of campaign and regional community services for United Israel Appeal of Canada.

He said the Jewish population peaked around the 1950s.

"The successful Jews started to move out when their kids went to university – it's the usual story."

When Romberg travelled to Timmins two years ago and met with Feldman, he made a special discovery.

"I spent a couple days there, met with the community, and then Michael says, 'I want to show you something very special,'" Romberg recalled.

"He had this box that looks like a treasure chest, that he basically created himself. We open it up and he says, 'This is a sefer Torah that my grandparents, Joseph and Sheva Martin, donated to the community in 1938 to celebrate their 50th wedding anniversary.'"

The Torah was used regularly while there was an active minyan at the shul, but since the closing of the synagogue, the Torah has been in a warehouse storage room that Feldman owns.

"At one point we had four or five [Torahs] when I was a little boy, but they were given away, and I don't even know where they are, personally," Feldman said.

After noticing that the Torah was still in very good shape, Romberg and Feldman discussed the possibility of finding an institution that could make use of the Torah.

Feldman said he ultimately decided to give the Torah to UIAC on the condition that if anyone linked to the Jewish community in Timmins was celebrating a family simchah, such as a bar mitzvah, that they would have access to the Torah.

"We let it be known that they could always borrow it for a special occasion as long as it's given back and looked after," Feldman said.

"The Torah was checked by a sofer, who determined that the Torah is at least 100 years old and brought over from Europe," Romberg said.

"It cost several thousand dollars to make it kosher again and to fix it up."

Romberg said he thought the northern branch of TanenbaumCHAT would be a good fit for the Torah and made arrangements with Paul Shaviv, TanenbaumCHAT's educational director, and Rabbi Moshe Yeres, the vice-principal.

"It's kept at the TanenbaumCHAT campus, and they take it on their Shabbatons, usually to Camp George," Romberg said, adding that the Torah has been kept at the Jewish high school since October.

"At least it's being put to use, it's not in storage and it's a mitzvah that people who don't have a Torah can use it," Feldman said.

Romberg said he was touched by the Torah's resurrection.

"To have seen the last sefer Torah in a community that was lying in storage in a warehouse in Timmins to come alive again, be fixed up and be used by Jewish youth, to me, is a very emotional thing," he said.

"What has this sefer Torah witnessed in its life? Coming from somewhere in Europe, across to the mining town of Timmins and now to this beautiful new building at CHAT – it is a real life cycle event in many respects."

100-year-old scroll donated to TanenbaumCHAT

Author pens halacha series

"I have a confession to make. I have always found Jewish law (halacha) to be a fascinating topic that requires much focus and attention to detail. We're taught from an early age about the basics of halacha – keep kosher, don't mix meat and milk, observe Shabbat, etc., but the intricacies of halacha go much further."

On Campus

Universities not anti-Semitic havens, admins say

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Although there's tension between Jewish and anti-Israel student groups, Canadian campuses aren't hotbeds of anti-Semitism, five Canadian university representatives told a Parliamentary inquiry panel formed to combat anti-Semitism in Canada.

On Nov. 24, Ryerson University president Sheldon Levy, York University's vice-president academic and provost Patrick Monahan, Concordia University president emeritus Fred Lowy, the University of Ottawa's Centre for Equity and Human Rights director Francine Page, and the University of Toronto's assistant vice-president Robert Steiner testified at a hearing organized by the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition for Combating Antisemitism (CPCCA).

The group, formed in March, brings together 22 Canadian parliamentarians whose aim is to confront anti-Semitism in Canada today.

The coalition was inspired by the inaugural conference of the Inter-parliamentary Committee for Combating Antisemitism held in London last February, which drew more than 125 legislators from some 40 countries to discuss anti-Semitism. It included a delegation of 11 Canadian MPs led by Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney and Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler.

Since Nov. 2, the CPCCA's inquiry committee has been holding hearings on Parliament Hill, during which students, academics, Jewish community leaders, university administrators and other professionals – Jewish and non-Jewish – have spoken about anti-Semitism in Canada.

After the eighth and final hearing concludes on Dec. 8, the coalition plans to produce a report and anticipates a formal government response by next fall.

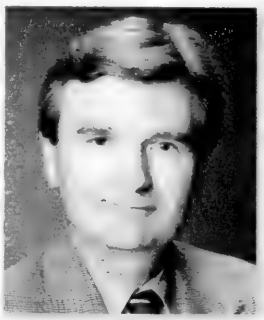
Steiner, who spoke first at the Nov. 24 hearing, said there's no generalized anti-Semitism at U of T.

"There is no evidence of Jewish students being systematically harassed and intimidated on our campuses," he said. "There is no evidence that it is dangerous to be a pro-Israeli student, faculty member or staff member on our campus."

He added that there are tensions "between groups advocating different ideas," but incidents of anti-Semitism, as well as of other forms of racism and homophobia, are the exception, not the rule.

Steiner said that administrators aim "not to insulate [students] from the tension of opposing views," but "to maximize their opportunities for dissent, in a manner that is tolerant, inclusive and safe."

"We can only respond to racism by confronting it directly, prosecuting it whenever warranted, protecting the safety of our members and promoting diversity with unwavering commitment," he added.



Patrick Monahan

Lowy, Concordia's president from 1995 to 2005, agreed that Canadian campuses are safe "and are not hotbeds of anti-Semitism or racism of any kind, although these conditions do occur, as they do in any society.

"Possibly, anti-Semitism is more overt on campus than it is in Canadian society [because]... students generally tend to be drawn to anti-establishment policies, anti-establishment events," Lowy said, adding that Israel and even Jews in general, are seen as establishment.

"Israel is seen as powerful, relatively affluent in the Middle East. Palestinians are seen as victims and the oppressed," he added.

Lowy also blamed a rise of anti-Israel sentiments on campus on "organized Islamic anti-Israeli propaganda and activism. I said Islamic because I'm not talking about Muslims generally or Arabs generally."

He said the vast majority of Arab and Muslim students are simply interested in getting an education.

But, Lowy recalled, at Concordia, – where he was president in 2002 when a violent protest broke out in the hours before then-former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu was scheduled to speak on campus – there was a small group of Islamist students who mobilized support from the Muslim student community, and then within the general activist community.

He said that criticism of Israel is "entirely appropriate," but criticism of Israel tends to cross the line into anti-Zionism and Israel is singled out for criticism and boycotts, which is "out of proportion to its contributions to unrest in the world."

Levy, Ryerson's president, spoke briefly about the tension caused by the annual Israeli Apartheid Week – a week-long series of anti-Israel events held on campuses worldwide – which some see as an opportunity to speak out against the Israeli government and others see as anti-Semites taking the opportunity to speak out against Jews.

He said that, based on a study that consulted both faculty and staff about how to handle tensions, both pro- and anti-Israel students agreed that ground rules should be established to "allow for a civilized discussion and to be clear that the language is intended to be focused on criticism of the policies of the Israeli government."

After listing a number of strategies that his administration is undertaking to ease hostilities between student groups, Levy said external, non-campus groups should leave it to administrators to handle the issue.

"I wish there was a way that we could educate external groups about the university and how we go about our business to protect the rights of individuals. External groups, quite often, in their interest of trying to help, make life even more difficult for us," Levy said.

York's representative, Monahan, spoke about York's Task Force on Student Life, Learning and Community, which was founded in March as a result of an incident the previous month when Jewish students were barricaded in the Hillel lounge by students shouting anti-Zionist slogans.

The incident was sparked by a press conference to announce a student-run initiative to have the York Federation of Students executive impeached due to its members' inactivity during the three-month CUPE strike last year.

Monahan listed some of task force's recommendations and said York was making progress on issues that are "challenging issues for all universities in Canada."

But he also expressed concern about messages in the media and views held by some people that York is "unfriendly toward Jewish students, and a hotbed of anti-Semitism."

He added that the narrative has been picked up by "people who have never set foot on the campus, but purport to be experts on the atmosphere on this campus. I think it's unfair and it's not just unfair to the university, it is unfair to the students, because it sows fear, it sows division and it fans flames for more conflict."

Monahan said he hopes the CPCCA will deal with these misconceptions rather than add to that narrative.

Racy calendar aims to change image of seniors

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors (CJCS) is heralding its 50th anniversary by publishing a calendar. (Yawn.) The models for each month are some of its volunteers, women and men in their 60s and 70s. (Ho-hum.)

They're naked. (That's not a typo.)

The calendars, which went on sale this week, are having the intended effect of shaking up the image of the agency and, by extension, society's perceptions of the elderly.

The CJN was given a sneak peek at "Mr. and Mrs. January" a.k.a. Irving and Evie Applebee. Their portrait isn't a shadowy, artsy shot but a brightly lit photo of the grinning couple in the all-together standing in the CJCS lobby.

The only thing keeping them decent is a handful (two handfuls in her case) of brochures fanned over their more intimate parts.

But there is still plenty of skin on view, and both look pretty buff, it may be added.

The cover of the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors' risqué calendar features volunteer Linda Richmond with a 'come-hither' look.

"There is more to us than meets the eye," reads the poster for the calendar, which is being sold for $10.

"We expect it to cause quite a stir," said CJCS executive director Herb Finkelberg. "Is it about sex? Absolutely."

It's not about money, he affirms. This is not a fundraiser. The calendar is a dramatic way of sending the message that sex is not only for the young and that seniors should feel good about their bodies – and themselves – even if they don't look like they did when they were 20 or 30.

At the CJCS, you're never past your "best before" date. "You can still be vibrant, alive and sexy," said Finkelberg, a trim 65 himself.

Each month features a different volunteer or two captured in the area of the CJCS where they most often carry out their duties. The gregarious Applebees are greeters at the entrance, directing and providing information to people who walk in the door.

Other shots were taken in the cafeteria, art room, exercise areas, the orchestra's rehearsal space, woodworking shop, etc., with each of the models holding "fig leaves" suggestive of the setting.

All of the photos were taken on site, except for the one of the Applebees, because there was no way of closing off the lobby from gawkers, so it was done in studio. (As it is, one staff member's jaw nearly hit the floor when she inadvertently walked in on one of the other shoots.)

The photographers are talented amateur Rina Friedman and professional Morty Benedik, one of whose specialities is "boudoir" photography. He donated his services.

Everyone felt comfortable disrobing in front of him, and the whole experience was a hoot, said Finkelberg. He said volunteers who were thought to be game for such exposure were approached.

"When they asked me, I went through the floor," said Evie, 65. "I'd never done anything like that before."

She said she would have to ask her husband. "He didn't bat an eyelash and said 'Do whatever you want. It's OK with me.'" Then the committee decided that he should be in the photo, too.

"'No way in hell,' he said right away," she recalled. To make a long story short – it had to be because they only had two hours to make up their mind – Irving, 72, was in.

"When we got to the studio, I told the photographer that I needed either a tranquilizer or a drink. He said he couldn't give me either, because it would show up in my eyes."

The end of the story is that the Applebees had a good time. "We laughed and laughed and laughed. I just hope the community enjoys this as much as we did," Evie said.

"I think it shows that at this age you can still enjoy life and be a little unconventional."

Israeli entrepreneur a biotech pioneer

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's dynamic biotechnology industry owes a debt of gratitude to Haim Aviv.

A former Weizmann Institute of Science professor, he is regarded as one of its founders.

Aviv, 69, broke new ground in 1980 by establishing Bio-Technology General Corporation, a genetic engineering company known today as Savient. He launched it with the assistance of venture capitalists in New York City.

At that time, there were few biotech companies in Israel, and the concept of establishing an entire industry based on something as capital-intensive and scientifically complex as biotechnology seemed inconceivable.

In recognition of his pioneering efforts, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev awarded him an honorary degree earlier this year.

Nearly three decades on, Israel is home to a thriving $500-million industry of more than 100 biotech companies employing several thousand workers.

Among them are Teva Pharmaceutical Industries, which has morphed into a global giant.

The founder of six biotech firms, including Pharmos and Diatech Diagnostics, Aviv was in Toronto recently to promote and seek out investors for his latest company, HerbaMed, of which he is chief executive officer.

HerbaMed has produced a health bar made from citrus peel, a source of fibre that can strengthen a weak heart and reduce bad cholesterol.

"It's a natural product that potentially can do the job of the drug Lipitor," he said in an interview, adding that Chinese and Indian medicine has long considered citrus peel as medicinally effective.

The bar, though sold in Russia and Ukraine, has yet to be marketed elsewhere.

Aviv, whose son is a stem cell researcher in Toronto, hopes to introduce the bar Canada and the United States within six months, and to the rest of Europe within a year, if he can find suitable investors and marketing partners.

In addition to the bar, Aviv has developed a range of products, sold in the form of capsules and beverages, that are useful in combating prostate problems and blindness and strengthening heart muscles.

The ingredients in these products are derived from fish oils (imported from Canada and Norway), cactus flowers and yeast.

Aviv, who has served as chair of Israel's National Biotechnology Committee and has almost 40 scientific papers to his credit, earned a PhD in biochemistry from the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot.

While at its department of virology, he successfully cloned the bovine growth hormone cDNA, which has increased milk production in Israel by a factor of about 10 per cent.

Haim Aviv

Aviv, who retired from the Weizmann Institute about 10 years ago to pursue private interests, became a biotech entrepreneur for two reasons: to staunch Israel's brain drain and encourage young Israeli scientists.

As he put it, "One of the main things that motivated me was the huge drain of life science doctoral students from Israel. They would graduate from institutions of higher learning and leave the country, because there was no industrial infrastructure to absorb them."

Until recently, Israel's biotech industry suffered from a deficiency of local funding.

But now that the Israeli government has created a $100-million financing vehicle, researchers and entrepreneurs like Aviv may not have to look abroad for development funds.

"It's long overdue," he said of the fund. "I recommended it years ago."

The biotech industry in Israel also needs more experienced managers, but this problem is gradually being overcome.

"We're getting there," said Aviv.

No objections raised to seniors' nudity

For weeks, mystery has surrounded the calendar project, which has been kept under wraps, so to speak, in order to create buzz. The models kept mum until their coming out.

"Other volunteers are now asking 'How come I'm not part of this?' We are going to be hard-pressed not to do this again next year," Finkelberg said.

So far nobody has raised any objections to the nudity.

He terms the photos "tasteful."

The initial run of 500 calendars, which come in a sealed package, was selling out quickly. Many were reserved in advance, sight unseen.

CJCS Foundation executive director Cathy Simons said the 50th anniversary committee was "very clear that it wanted a good mix of people," men and women of different shapes and sizes. "They didn't want to show only perfect people."

The calendars also provide information on the many activities at the CJCS and include a timeline of the agency's history. On the back are pictures of the pinups (clothed), just in case you hadn't recognized them au naturel.

"I think we are demonstrating that this is not your father's or your grandfather's golden age club," Finkelberg said.

While maintaining its traditional programs for the frail elderly, the CJCS has adapted to meet the needs of today's healthier, better educated retiree, he said.

CJCS, a Federation CJA agency, is the modern-day successor of a small creative arts program held in the basement of a building at the corner of Victoria Avenue and Côte Ste. Catherine Road in the 1950s that eventually became the Golden Age Association.

Today, the CJCS "touches the lives" of 8,000 people aged 50 and up annually, said Finkelberg, who has been director since 1980.

More than 2,700 are enrolled in its courses this fall and 2,500 benefit from its support services. An estimated 600 people a day come through its doors, and Evie and Irving know the names of each and every one of them (almost).

Certainly, their names will be legend after this week.

Chanukah Food & Gift Ideas

Latkes – variations on an old theme

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Chanukah comes early this year. You know that old joke? Jewish holidays are either early or late – they never come on time!

When my boys were young, I used to hate it when Chanukah came early. By the time Christmas rolled around, all their toys were already broken. Oh, the joys of the Hebrew lunar calendar. Only once, to my memory, did Chanukah fall after Christmas. That year, I saved all my Chanukah shopping for the day after Christmas sales. (Talk about a leap of faith!)

As we light the candles this year, I can't help but remember the Chanukahs of my youth. My mother's family was very close, and we cousins (13 of us) were raised together practically as siblings. Remember the movie Avalon? That was our childhood (without the fire, of course!) There were so many of us Papa Harry even put a board in the children's table.

The highlight, of course, was our Chanukah party. The pile of latkes! The mountain of presents! The noise! The excitement! The squabbles! Then when we cousins started producing the great-grandchildren, Aunt Sally's basement bulged with our bounty. (No one ever thought of drawing names for a gift exchange back then!)

When we moved to California from New York, our boys were six and four. Away from our roots, our friends became our extended family, and our neighbours only too eager to share our traditions. On the first night of Chanukah, I would make my signature latkes, those crispy, irresistible potato pancakes, and set them on doily-lined Chanukah paper plates for my boys to distribute up and down the block.

I have noticed through the years, however, that a kind of snobbery has developed among latke aficionados, who view with disdain from their lofty perch those who use a blender to process the potatoes. Their mantra? Shredded is better. "Oh, no," they tsk-tsk when they see my recipe, just a touch of feigned sympathy in their eyes. "I prefer to grate. I like texture."

Texture? You want texture? I'll give you texture. Use my SPLAT! method (see recipe below), and you'll get all the texture you want with these babies. My family hovers over the pan to fight over the thinnest ones that are so crunchy and full of holes you can practically see through them, so turn down your decibel meter.

Here's a tip that will really cut down your workload. You can actually prepare the batter up to a day ahead! I learned this trick years ago from my friend, Elaine Asa. Prepare the batter without adding the flour, and pour the mixture into a tight-fitting glass jar. Tap the jar on the counter to release any air bubbles, cover the batter well with a thick layer of flour, and refrigerate up to 24 hours. (Do not use plastic ware.) When ready to cook, remove the flour layer with the black ring that has formed beneath it. Then add the flour, stir and fry.

I found a really easy latke recipe in Can't Believe it's Kosher, a community cookbook put out by the Congregation Beth Israel Sisterhood in Milwaukee, edited by Beverly Feiges. This one calls for shredded hash brown potatoes. What could be simpler?

No matter how you make your latkes, Feiges recommends draining them well on paper towels. To get them really crisp, drain them flat first, and then stand them up on their edges at an angle, leaning against a dish. And you can make them ahead. Refrigerate them, and when you are ready to serve, just heat them on a metal cookie sheet in a preheated 350-degree oven just until they're crisp.

And speaking of easy, you'll find another no-grate alternative "latke" in Norene's Healthy Kitchen by our own Norene Gilletz, really a cross between a latke and a French fry – who can resist? She calls them Smashed Potato "Latkes," a side dish that doubles as a punching bag! Use baby red-skinned potatoes for these irresistible crisps. You boil them ahead, smash and bake.

JUDY'S POTATO LATKES

From Cooking Jewish: 532 Great Recipes from the Rabinowitz Family (Workman) by Judy Bart Kancigor

2 lb. russet potatoes
2 large eggs
1/2 medium-size onion, coarsely chopped
1/2 medium-size firm apple, peeled and coarsely chopped
1 1/2 tsp. kosher (coarse) salt, or to taste
1/8 tsp. white pepper
1 tsp. baking powder
1/4 to 1/2 cup all-purpose flour or matzah meal peanut or canola oil, for frying sour cream and/or applesauce, for serving

Peel the potatoes and cut them into 1-inch cubes. Submerge them in a bowl of water while you're preparing the remaining ingredients, to keep them white and release some of the starch.

Place the eggs in a blender. Add the onion, apple, salt, white pepper and baking powder. Drain the potatoes and squeeze them dry in paper towels. Add enough of the potatoes to fill the blender (all 2 pounds may not fit). Turn on the blender, and pushing down on the sides with a rubber spatula (careful you don't blend the spatula – there is no rubber in this recipe), blend until the potatoes just move around. Add the remaining potatoes as you're blending, but do not overprocess or make it too smooth. The texture should resemble applesauce. (This takes about 6 seconds in my Osterizer.)

Transfer the batter to a large bowl and add the flour. The batter should be flowing, but not too thin.

Now for the real secret of my very crisp latkes: pour enough oil into a large skillet to coat the bottom. Heat the oil over medium-high heat until it is quite hot but not smoking. Use a serving spoon to scoop up the batter (about 2 tablespoons per scoop), hold the spoon about 8 inches above the pan, and spill it all at once. Splat!

Remove your hand quickly so you don't burn yourself. (Like tennis, it's all in the wrist.) The batter will splatter, forming holes… the better to hold the sour cream or applesauce. Repeat with as many as will fit in the skillet without crowding. Cook until browned, about 1 minute. Then flip them over and cook the other side for 1 minute.

Drain the latkes well on paper towels, and keep them warm while you cook the remainder, adding more oil as needed.

Serve immediately, with sour cream and/or applesauce. Makes about 3 dozen latkes .

SHORT-CUT POTATO LATKES

Can't Believe it's Kosher, Congregation Beth Israel Sisterhood, Milwaukee

2 medium onions, chopped fine
1 (16-oz.) package fresh shredded hash brown potatoes
3 eggs, lightly beaten
1-2 tsp. salt or to taste
1/4 tsp. pepper
1 tsp. sugar (optional)
1/4 cup flour or matzah meal
oil for frying

Combine onions and shredded potatoes; add eggs, salt, pepper, sugar and flour. Mix well.

Heat oil in nonstick skillet. Scoop about 1/4 cup of potato mixture for each pancake into skillet. Fry on 1 side until edges begin to brown. Turn and fry on other side until done. Remove to glass dish lined with paper towel to drain off excess oil. Continue adding oil to skillet as needed.

Latkes may be refrigerated until ready to serve. Remove from refrigerator and heat in a 350° oven for 5 to 10 minutes before serving. Yield: 6 servings.

SMASHED POTATO 'LATKES'

Norene's Healthy Kitchen by Norene Gillet (Whitecap)

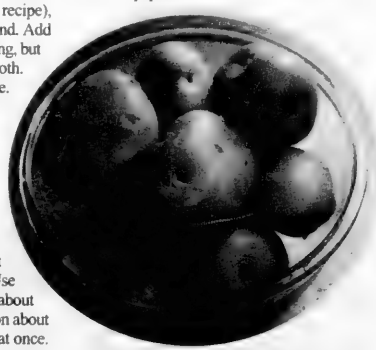
8 baby red-skinned potatoes (2 to 2 1/2 inches in diameter)
salted water
1 tbsp. extra virgin olive or canola oil
1/2 tsp. salt or Montreal-style steak spice
1/4 tsp. lemon pepper (or to taste)
dried basil, garlic powder, onion powder, w and/or paprika



Boil the potatoes in salted water to cover for 15 to 20 minutes or until fork tender. Drain well. (If desired, the potatoes can be prepared in advance up to this point and refrigerated for a day or two.)

Preheat the oven to 400. Line a large baking sheet with parchment paper or sprayed foil.

Place the potatoes in a single layer about 3 inches apart on the prepared baking sheet. Cover one potato with a piece of parchment paper. Smash it once or twice with the flat palm of your hand, making a flat disc about 4 inches in diameter. Round off any ragged edges by pushing them together with your fingers. Repeat with the remaining potatoes.

Brush the tops of the smashed potatoes lightly with olive oil and sprinkle with seasonings. Bake, uncovered, for 20 to 25 minutes or until golden and crispy. If desired, turn over the potatoes halfway through the cooking process. Yield: 8 potatoes.

Memories of Mrs. Boro's potato knishes

BY BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

With Chanukah upon us, it's time to plan that party menu. Buffets are usually the order of the day and so it's nice to have a variety of finger foods. One of my all-time favourite party offerings is the homemade cocktail knish, which is a rarity these days. Knish-making is a dying art, one that has not been passed down through the generations.

In my own life, there were only two people who made knishes.

Raizelle Boro

My grandmother, Ethel Kirshner, made great cheese knishes, but her recipe died with her. The only other person I knew who made knishes was Raizelle Boro, the mother of my longtime school chum Jewel Boro Frank. As a child growing up in Montreal, it surprised me that someone like Mrs. Boro, who was born and raised in Montreal, knew how to make knishes, because I thought it was a dish made only by grandmothers and perhaps European-born Jews. Even my mother, who was born in Poland, did not make knishes. Mrs. Boro was also steeped in Yiddishkeit, which I found surprising for someone born in Canada. I did not know anyone else in my parents' generation who went to synagogue every Shabbat.

However, Mrs. Boro was an unusual woman for her generation. Not only was she a consummate balabusta, but she also worked as a bookkeeper, she was an active fundraiser, an avid reader and, later in life, she became a sculptor. She was an early prototype of today's supermom.

Mrs. Boro's knishes and cakes

On the anniversary of her first yahrzeit, it's a fitting time to remember Mrs. Boro, who died in Montreal last December at the age of 85.

As a teenager, it didn't occur to me that Mrs. Boro worked outside of the home. In those days most of the mothers I knew were full-time homemakers.

It didn't dawn on me that someone who could bake from scratch and have a spotless house could also have a job.

Boro Frank recalled that her grandmother was very critical when her mother took a bookkeeping job shortly after the youngest of her three children started school. "My mother got a lot of flack from my grandmother.

"She [grandmother] said people would talk. They would think that my father wasn't making enough money to support the family.

"But my mother went back to work to expand her horizons. She still had some accounts when she was in her 80s."

Boro Frank says one of the toughest things her mother did was care for her late daughter, Ryna Boro, who died of cancer in Florida in 2003. "My mother moved in with my sister and nursed her full time."

Boro Frank described her mother as a artistic woman who expressed much of her creativity in her baking. "She made these incredible birthday cakes. I had one with a doll in the middle and the cake was the skirt. She made train cakes for my brother."

Mrs. Boro was also one of the few mothers that I knew who baked up a storm and stayed thin. She was an attractive woman, blond and green-eyed who married her high school sweetheart, Irving. I have this image of her fashionably dressed in a straight black skirt doling out her unbelievably delicious chocolate cake.

Right now, Boro Frank is working hard at mastering her mother's knish recipe. She's planning to serve them for a dinner just before her older son Gill's wedding in May.

She says her mother taught her to make knishes for her two sons' bar mitzvahs. "My mother, my sister and I stayed up all night. We made dozens of knishes for the cocktail party."

I remember getting advance notice about the menu before Boro Frank's youngest son, Noah's bar mitzvah. I made sure to starve myself that day so that I would have plenty of room for Mrs. Boro's knishes.

Eating them brought back memories of Mrs. Boro working in her kitchen.

There was always something delicious to eat. You really hit the culinary jackpot on a Friday afternoon when Mrs. Boro's potato knishes came out of the oven, hot and fresh.

Culinary jackpot

MRS. BORO'S POTATO KNISHES

6 potatoes, pared
Salt and pepper to taste
1 package of puffed dough
1 egg, beaten

Preheat oven to 350 degrees. Prepare a greased cookie sheet.

Cook potatoes in salted water. Drain, mash, cool and season with salt and pepper.

Roll out puffed pastry on a clean floured table. The pastry should be 25 inches long by 5 inches in width. Spread potatoes mixture in centre and down the length of the stretched dough in a mound that is about 1.5 inches high by 1.5 inches wide. Width-wise pinch the two sides together, along the length of the pastry. And seal pinched side with beaten egg.

Then cut the long filled dough at 1-inch intervals to make individual cocktail-size knishes. Pinch the sides closed and seal with beaten egg.

Place knishes on cookie sheet. Bake 15 to 20 minutes until outside is golden brown. Makes 2 dozen knishes.

MRS. BORO'S CHOCOLATE CAKE

2 squares semisweet chocolate
1/4 pound butter
1 cup icing sugar
2 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
3/4 cup flour
1/2 cup milk
2 tsp. baking powder.

Preheat oven 350 degrees. Grease a bundt pan. Sift flour and baking powder in separate bowl. Melt chocolate and butter together. In a separate bowl cream eggs, sugar and vanilla. Add chocolate to the egg and sugar mixture. Add milk. Add flour and then stir the mixture together. Pour in prepared pan. Bake at 350 for 35 to 40 minutes or until a toothpick comes out clean.

Vegetables prepared with olive oil also recall the Chanukah miracle

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

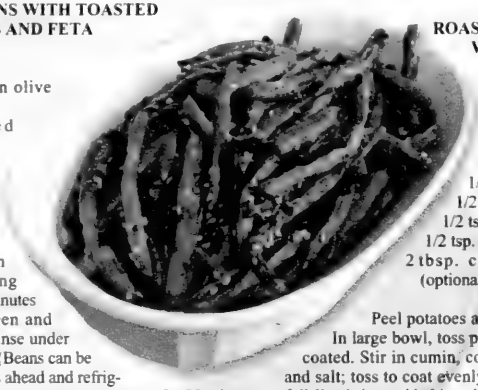
Chanukah, to me, is synonymous, at least gastronomically, with latkes and sufganiyot. And, as much as I love latkes, both the regular variety and the sweet potato variety, I do enjoy making several other dishes during the eight days that clearly reflect the miracle we celebrate. The following vegetable recipes, meant either for use only with your family or during a more festive dinner (they can all be doubled easily), use olive oil as the oil of choice. Olive oil's fruity tones enhance the cauliflower, green beans and potatoes in the recipes below and still honour the memory of the oil that lasted for eight days in the Temple.

HONEY ROASTED CAULIFLOWER

1 large head cauliflower
1/4 cup extra virgin olive oil
3/4 tsp salt
3 tbsp. honey
2 tbsp. sherry vinegar
3/4 tsp. dried thyme

Break cauliflower into florets. Toss with oil and salt until well coated. Place on foil-lined rimmed baking sheet. Roast in 425-degree oven for 30 minutes, stirring once. Meanwhile, stir together honey, vinegar and thyme. Pour over cauliflower, stirring to coat well. Continue roasting for 15 to 20 minutes or until cauliflower is soft and golden. Makes 6 servings

GREEN BEANS WITH TOASTED ALMONDS AND FETA



1 lb. green beans
3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
2 tbsp. minced shallots
1/3 cup toasted sliced almonds
3/4 cup crumbled feta cheese

Cook beans in large pot of boiling salted water for 7 minutes or until bright green and tender. Drain and rinse under cold running water. (Beans can be made up to 24 hours ahead and refrigerated covered. Bring to room temperature for 30 minutes before continuing).

In large skillet set over medium high heat, heat oil. Add shallots and cook, stirring, for 2 minutes or until softened. Stir in almonds and beans; cook, stirring, for 3 to 5 minutes. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Transfer to serving dish. Sprinkle with feta. Makes 4 servings.

ROASTED SWEET POTATOES WITH CINNAMON AND CORIANDER

2 lb. sweet potatoes (around 4)
1/4 cup olive oil
1/2 tsp. cumin
1/2 tsp ground coriander
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1/2 tsp. sweet paprika
1/2 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. chopped fresh coriander (optional)

Peel potatoes and cut into bite size chunks. In large bowl, toss potatoes with oil until evenly coated. Stir in cumin, coriander, cinnamon, paprika and salt; toss to coat evenly. Arrange in single layer in foil-lined rimmed baking sheet.

Roast in centre of oven at 375 for about 45 minutes or until completely tender. Makes 4 servings.

Latkes can make a delectable dessert

BY RANDY FINGRUT
Special to The CJN

I have always thought that the pleasures of a delectable dessert are a necessity of life. One only has to possess a slight sweet tooth to agree that dessert is the most important part of any meal. What could be more amusing or more satisfying than concluding a Chanukah meal with a scrumptious dessert that is also somewhat unconventional? When people think about dessert, they do not usually think of latkes!

I would like to share three delightfully different dessert versions of the traditional Chanukah latke. Show off your imaginative side and create an unforgettable finale to a Chanukah meal or a late-night dessert.

APPLE LATKES WITH FRENCH VANILLA YOGURT AND APPLE SALSA

This Chanukah, envision being swept away to a posh French restaurant. Notice a platter of delicate crepes, with tempting toppings, placed on a charming little café table. There is a soupcon of crisp apple and pure vanilla aromas wafting into the air. Look around once more, this is not a dream. Behold, a platter of hot and crispy, mouth-watering homemade apple latkes right here at home for you to enjoy!

Apple Latkes
4 large firm apples
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 eggs
2/3 cup cold water
2 tbsp. honey
1 tsp. vanilla
Pinch salt
1 cup all-purpose flour
2 tbsp. canola oil, additional oil if necessary
French vanilla yogurt, low fat

Peel and grate apples. Toss with lemon juice.

In a large bowl mix eggs with water, honey and vanilla. In another bowl combine dry ingredients. Add the dry ingredients to the egg mixture and blend well, add the apples and mix until it looks like lumpy pancake batter.

Option A

Heat oil in a large non-stick pan. Using a 1/4 cup measure, ladle mixture into pan about 4 at a time, and flatten with a fork. Fry, turning as needed, until golden, about 6 minutes per side. Drain on paper towels. Repeat, adding additional oil if necessary.

Option B

Line a baking sheet with parchment paper that has been sprayed with canola oil. Position 1/4 cup of latke mixture 2-3 inches apart. Flatten with a fork. Bake in a 350 degree oven for 20-25 minutes, turning over halfway and continuing to bake until golden. Serve immediately with vanilla yogurt and apple salsa. May be made ahead and reheated.

APPLE SALSA

1/2 cup mixed jumbo raisins
1 cup hot water
2 firm large apples, cored, peeled and diced
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
3 tbsp. honey
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract

Soften raisins in hot water for 10 minutes. Meanwhile, add remainder of ingredients into a covered dish and microwave on high for 4 minutes. Drain raisins and add to apple mixture. Cool to room temperature.

Mazel kosher wine tasting: something for every palate

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

It's often thought that there are two kinds of Jews: those who care about wine and those who keep kosher. Those who care, the stereotype goes, must go beyond the Jewish world to find wines that satisfy a sophisticated palate. And those who keep kosher? Just serve up the kiddush wine, the sweeter the better.

Wine experts Irvin Wolkoff and Sheila Swerling-Puritt disagreed at a kosher wine tasting held on Nov. 11 at Baycrest's Wagman Centre, hosted by Mazel Wines, agents to the LCBO. They offered educated views on a sampling of some of the best kosher wines to a mixed crowd of consumers, caterers and writers for a number of publications.

Wolkoff attacked the myth that flash-pasteurizing, the "mevushal" process often used in kosher production, ruins fine wine. "There's no hint that they've been cooked or damaged - it's really remarkable."

Only a scattering of hands went up when he asked who drank wine daily. Wolkoff, the first physician member of the Wine Writers Circle of Canada, promotes the health benefits of regular, moderate drinking.

Many of us don't take wine seriously, said Swerling-Puritt, president of the Wine Writers Circle, sketching basic principles that can help consumers buy smarter and drink better. "But the most important rule," she said, "is don't stress out about wine."

The evening's program "de-stressed" wine, with a program of eight: three red, three white and two sweet wines from around the world, and available from the LCBO. In order from the lighter dry whites to the heavier reds and finally dessert, each was paired with a different bite-sized appetizer, crafted by Baycrest Hospitality Services to perfectly complement the wine.

The first, a Hafner Gruner Veltliner (LCBO# 157511; $13.85), was accompanied by a spoon-sized portion of pickled beets, which echoed the wine's astringency. The wine might be a good choice with brunch – or even lokshin kugel, Wolkoff joked. "It's pleasantly pungent… with notes of green granny apple and elder flowers."

Sampling wines at the Wagman Centre.

Next was an Italian Cantina Gabriele Pinot Grigio (LCBO No. 66571; $18.35) with a tuna-sesame tidbit; the tuna's substantial flavour balanced what Wolkoff called the wine's "bright, sweet," almost grapefruit-like spiciness. Made by a family that has been producing kosher wines for three generations, it might also serve well to accompany veal, salmon or risotto.

Wolkoff offered illuminating and humorous tidbits for non-wine-lovers: wine regions, grape species, ripeness, oak barrel aging and alcohol content: "Too much numbs the tongue."

He called 13 per cent "high-ish" in an Efrat Israeli Chardonnay (LCBO No. 156976; $17), yet appreciated its "nice, rich persistence of flavour." In keeping with the Middle Eastern theme, it was served with tahini-dipped falafel balls. "The sweet, 'herby' quality of the falafel reflects" a similar characteristic in the Chardonnay, right down to its substantial "chewy" texture, he said.

Fragrant basil bruschetta was paired with another Cantina Gabriele wine, a Chianti (LCBO No. 111534; $18.35) that Swerling-Puritt called "approachable," avoiding the astringency sometimes found with the region's distinctive Sangiovese grapes. It could also accompany grilled meats or hearty pasta.

Over teriyaki salmon and a Hafner Pinot Noir Reserve (LCBO No. 157503; $26.40), Wolkoff spoke of the challenge of Pinot Noir, calling the wines of this "heartbreak grape… very deep, very dark" – almost garnet, with sandalwood aromas. With its "very fine tannins," it could accompany hearty beef entrées.

The last red wine, with savoury stuffed mushrooms, was the Efrat Israeli Merlot (LCBO No. 141663; $16.95). With black cherry flavours reminiscent of "dark fruitcake," but "much warmer and darker" and "nice, long warm tones," some might feel the wine is too soft, yet its earthy mineral flavours echo the mushroom, making it a "very slick, user-friendly" wine for brisket or roast chicken.

Have a Little Faith. A True Story by Mitch Albom. Hyperion

In his first non-fiction book since Tuesdays with Morrie, author Mitch Albom brings the discussion about faith to a new and hopeful place. What if faith wasn't what separated us, he asks, but what brought us together?

Part personal story, part reportage, his new book crosses denominations and generations as it follows a unique journey between two worlds.

Day After Night by Anita Diamant. Scribner

Anita Diamant returns to the territory of her phenomenal bestseller The Red Tent in this intensely moving story of four young women who escape Nazi Europe for Israel, only to find themselves behind barbed wire once again in the British internment camp Atlit.

Only a few hundred of them survived the war. In this book, 10 of these children, now in their 70s, tell us how they managed to survive.

Journalist Hannelore Brenner met these women – who reunite each year at a Czech resort – and weaves together interviews with them with excerpts from their diaries and samples of the art, music and paintings they created at Theresienstadt. The result is a unique account of survival stories.

After the Falls - Coming of Age in the Sixties by Catherine Gildiner. Knopf Canada

When Catherine Gildiner's first memoir, Too Close to the Falls, launched, critics and fans sang its praises. But many were left wondering what happened to the precocious child, aged 13, when the book ended.

Now, 10 years later, Gildiner recounts her remarkable coming of age in the 1960s with the same wit, candour and exhilarating storytelling that made Too Close to the Falls a modern classic.

Based on the extraordinary true story of the October 1945 rescue of more than 200 prisoners from a camp for "illegal" immigrants near the Mediterranean coast south of Haifa, Diamant deftly weaves together the interlinking story of a vividly imagined cast of characters.

The Girls of Room 28 – Friendship, Hope and Survival in Theresienstadt. By Hannelore Brenner. Schocken Books

From 1942 to 1944, 12,000 children passed through the Theresienstadt internment camp, on their way to Auschwitz.

Shattering Glass by Nancy-Gay Rotstein. Overlook Duckworth.

In Shattering Glass, Toronto writer Nancy-Gay Rotstein weaves the tales of three women who find themselves caught between career and family, trying to maintain a precarious balance between success, independence and motherhood.

This novel, originally published in 1996 and translated into eight languages, was praised for its dramatic plotting and riveting dialogue. It has just been re-published by Overlook Duckworth.

FOR KIDS:

Clever Rachel by Debby Waldman. Illustrated by Cindy Revell. Orca Book Publishers.

Clever Rachel is the latest picturebook from the author/illustrator team of Debby Waldman and Cindy Revell. Their first book, A Sack Full of Feathers was shortlisted for three major Canadian book awards.

Clever Rachel is a retelling of an old Jewish folktale that promotes friendship and teamwork for young readers. It is full of witty riddles that children and adults alike will enjoy pondering. Recommended for children ages 4 to 8.

Canada Counts – A Charles Pachter Counting Book. Cormorant Books

Following on the success of Charles Pachter's M is for Moose, called an "all-time classic" by the Toronto Star, is this new release in which children can learn numbers.

In these pages, Pachter's new artwork helps illustrate numbers from 1 to 20 as well as important Canadian numbers such as 1967 and 1982. Highly recommended for young children.

Chef follows her dream

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Margie Arosh graduated from George Brown College of Culinary Arts three years ago at age 44, without having tasted anything she prepared.

The personal chef, caterer, and cooking instructor, who keeps strictly kosher, said that in her first year, she made arrangements with her instructor to have a cooking partner taste what she cooked.

"In second year, however, the instructor would not allow me to have a taster for the exams. I had to taste with my eyes. I relied on my knowledge and feel for food."

She said that for the butchery course, in which they learned to clean a pig, "my partner convinced me to put on a pair of gloves and take part.

"The course included far more than cooking, though. We had food theory and academic subjects. It was not an easy journey. Even when I had to travel downtown for early morning classes, I never complained. I felt like I had found my passion."

Born in Toronto of Moroccan parents, Arosh said she learned to cook Moroccan food with a Spanish influence.

"My mother was wonderful cook and baker, and she always had a house full of guests. My father always brought home people who had nowhere to go. I was taught early on how to feed people."

She renovated her own kitchen while she was still in school, and can now teach and prepare kosher meals from her home. "Sometimes I come downstairs just to walk around the kitchen. I'm living my dream."

Visit Arosh's website at www.margieskitchen.ca.

GREEK TILAPIA WITH TOMATOES, ARTICHOKES & KALAMATA OLIVES

1 medium onion, thinly sliced
4 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
8 garlic cloves, finely minced
1/3 cup dry white wine
1 (9-oz.) package frozen artichoke hearts, thawed and drained or
1 can artichoke hearts
4 medium tomatoes cut into wedges
1/2 cup pitted Kalamata olives, coarsely chopped
1 tbsp. capers (optional)
1/2 tsp. kosher salt
1/2 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
2 tsp. Greek oregano
4 tilapia or any firm white fish fillets zest of 1 lemon finely grated
1/4 cup water

Preheat oven to 375. Over medium high heat in a wide saucepan, sauté onion in 2 tablespoons of olive oil, until softened and golden, about 5 minutes. Add half of the garlic and cook, stirring, 1 minute. Add wine and boil down for 2 minutes. Add artichoke hearts, tomatoes, olives, capers, 1/2 teaspoon kosher salt, and 1/4 teaspoon pepper, 1 teaspoon oregano and bring to a medium simmer, stirring occasionally for about 10 minutes or until half the liquid is reduced. Taste to adjust seasoning.

Meanwhile, season fish with salt and freshly ground pepper. Stir together lemon zest, 1 teaspoon oregano, remaining garlic and remaining 2 tablespoons olive oil and brush on both sides of fish. Place fish into a 13- by 9- by 2-inch glass or ceramic baking dish and bake for 10 minutes. Remove from oven and spoon sauce around fish. If the sauce is thick, add the 1/4 cup of water. Lightly drizzle fish with liquid from sauce. Return to oven for 5-8 minutes or until fish is just opaque and cooked through. Serves 4.

SWEET POTATO SALAD WITH GOAT CHEESE, PINE NUTS & SUNFLOWER SEEDS

Two large sweet potatoes cut into thin strips like french fries
1 tsp. granulated garlic
1 tsp. kosher salt
1 tsp. freshly ground pepper
1 tsp. chili powder
1 tsp. oregano
1/4 cup olive oil
Salad
1 head romaine lettuce, washed, dried and cut into thin strips
2 medium tomatoes cut into strips
2 red or yellow peppers cut into strips
1 cup of goat cheese or feta
1/4 cup sunflower seeds
1/4 cup slivered toasted almonds
1/2 cup toasted pine nuts
1/2 cup mini toasted croutons
Dressing
zest and juice of one lemon
1 scallion finely chopped white and green parts
1/2 tsp. Dijon mustard
1/2 cup of olive oil
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 425 degrees. Toss the potatoes with the spices and oil and roast in the middle of the oven for 15 minutes. Toss and continue to roast for another 15 minutes or until golden and slightly crispy.

Combine the lettuce, tomatoes, peppers and croutons in a large bowl. In a separate bowl prepare the dressing. Place the Dijon mustard in the bowl along with the lemon zest, juice, salt and pepper. Drizzle in olive oil while whisking. Taste and adjust seasoning. Add scallions and drizzle half over lettuce.

Top the salad with a mound of the sweet potato fries and dollops of goat cheese. Garnish with seeds and nuts and drizzle with extra dressing. Serves: 4 to 6.

CHOCOLATE LATKES

This is a dessert that will be adored by children and adults alike. Although these latkes are not fried in oil, they look surprisingly like the real thing. Chocolate latkes appear crunchy, but they have a chewy texture and a divine flavour.

4 oz. semi-sweet chocolate, broken into pieces
1 4 cup sugar
2 tsp. pure vanilla extract
4 egg whites
3 cups flaked coconut
pinch of salt

In an uncovered 1 cup Pyrex measuring cup, microwave chocolate for one minute. Remove and stir with a fork until completely melted and smooth.

(The heat of the cup will continue to melt the chocolate without risk of burning.)

Let chocolate cool for several minutes.

Meanwhile, combine remaining ingredients in a large bowl, add chocolate and mix well.

Place parchment paper on baking sheets. Ladle 1/4 cup of mixture about 2-3 inches apart and flatten with a fork.

Bake in 350 degree oven, middle rack, for 15 minutes. Cool latkes completely before removing from baking sheet.

CHEESE BLINTZ LATKES

These latkes are similar in taste to traditional Cheese Blintzes, but they are extremely quick and easy to prepare. Enjoy them for dessert with your favourite blintzes topping!

1 cup pressed dry cottage cheese, 0.5 milk fat, salt free
3 eggs, beaten
3 tbsp. honey
3/4 cup skim milk
1-1/2 tsp.pure vanilla extract
1/4 tsp. salt
1 cup all-purpose flour
2 tbsp. canola oil, additional oil if necessary

In food processor or large bowl, mix cheese, eggs, honey, milk, vanilla, and salt.

Add flour and process or mix until smooth.

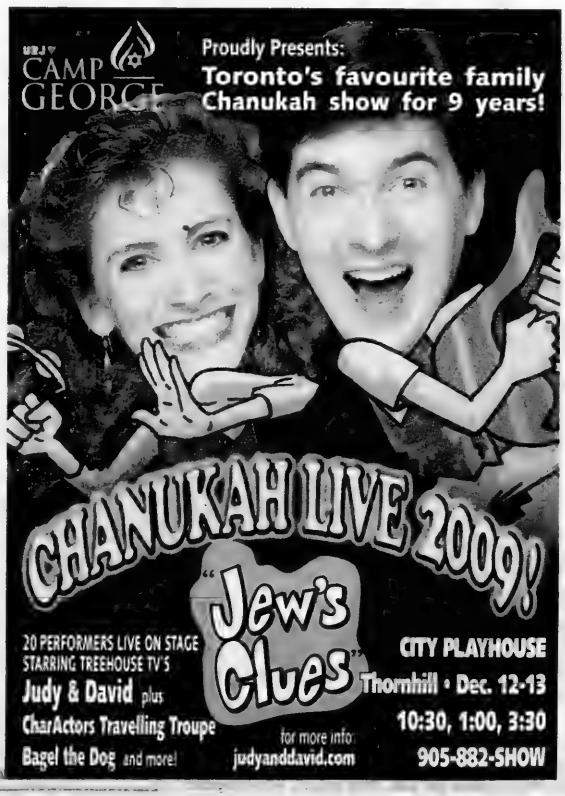
Option A

Heat oil in a large non-stick pan. Using a 1/4 cup measure, ladle mixture into pan about four at a time and flatten with a fork. Fry, turning as needed, until golden, on each side. Drain on paper towels. Repeat, adding additional oil if necessary.

Option B

Line a baking sheet with parchment paper that has been sprayed with canola oil. Position 1/4 cup of latke mixture 2 -3 inches apart. Bake in a 350 degree oven for 20-25 minutes, turning over halfway and continuing to bake until golden.

Serve hot with cherry- or blueberry-pie filling, jam, fresh fruit, sour cream or syrup.



Oil is the 'star' of Chanukah

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

If asked what the quintessential Chanukah food might be, the most probable answer would be potato latkes. However, the real star of the show should be the oil, not the potato. That whole miracle of the oil thing is what we are celebrating. That being taken into consideration, on one night of Chanukah my menu becomes all about frying up french fries and all other kinds of veggies in seasonings and batters.

According to Gourmet (a magazine that is sadly ceasing publication), the key to making the perfect french fries is to double fry them. They suggest that you flash fry them first to eliminate moisture, then fry them again for crispness. While the recipe for the fries was pretty good, I decided that a few other recipes that incorporate other vegetables and can be "oven" fried might just be the perfect food gift for my readers. Some of the recipes call for regular corn oil, others olive or peanut. They all have their own distinctive flavours, and you can really use them interchangeably. Don't season fried anything before serving.

SEASONED OVEN FRIES

4 large potatoes
4 tbsp. olive oil
2 tsp. paprika
2 tsp. garlic powder
2 tsp. cayenne powder
2 tsp. onion powder
1/4 tsp. cumin
Cheddar cheese (optional)
salt to taste

Preheat oven to 400. Cut potatoes into wedges and place them on a greased cookie sheet with sides. In a bowl combine the oil, paprika, garlic powder, cayenne powder, onion powder and cumin. Brush the wedges with the oil and spice mixture. Bake for 35 to 45 minutes depending on how crispy you want the fries. You can sprinkle the cheese over the top of the fries in the last 4 to 5 minutes of cooking. Salt to taste. Serves 4.

ROSEMARY PARMESAN SWEET POTATO FRIES

3 large sweet potatoes
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. black pepper
1 tbsp. dried rosemary
1 tbsp. Parmesan cheese
1 to 2 tbsp. breadcrumbs
3 tbsp. oil

Preheat oven to 450. Cut sweet potatoes, with skins on, into long thin sticks.

In a bowl, combine the oil salt, pepper, rosemary, breadcrumbs and Parmesan cheese. Add the sweet potato sticks and toss to coat. Place cooling rack on top of cookie sheet, spread potatoes in a single layer on top of cooling rack.

Cook at 450 degrees for 40 minutes or until desired crispiness.

FRIED ZUCCHINI

3 large zucchini, washed, trimmed, cut lengthwise into strips olive oil
1 tablespoon of salt

For batter:
1-1/2 cup soda water
1/2 tsp. salt
1-1/2 cup flour

Put the zucchini pieces in a bowl, salt them lightly and then let them sit for 20 minutes. Pour off the liquid, pat dry and set them aside.

In a bowl combine the soda, flour and salt. Whisk together.

Heat the oil. Dip the zucchini strips in the batter and then fry them in the oil for 4 to 5 minutes. The batter will puff up while it's frying. The strips will be done when they are lightly golden brown. Drain on paper towel and serve immediately. This doesn't reheat well. Serves 4 to 5 as a snack.

BATTER-FRIED MUSHROOMS

2 to 3 cups oil for frying
1 lb. whole white button mushrooms, cleaned and dried
2 eggs, beaten
8 oz. seltzer
1 cup cornstarch
salt and pepper to taste

Preheat the oil in a deep fryer or in a deep saucepan. In a bowl combine the eggs and seltzer and whisk to combine. Whisk in the cornstarch and salt and pepper a little bit at a time to prevent lumps. Dip the mushrooms in the batter and fry 1/3 of them at a time making sure that they don't clump together. Fry them for 2 to 3 minutes or until they are golden brown. Drain on paper towels and season with a little salt. Serve immediately. Serves 4 to 6. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

GARLIC ONION RINGS

2 cups flour
3 tsp. breadcrumbs
3/4 tsp. garlic salt
12 oz. beer, flat and at room temperature
1/4 cup oil, plus oil for frying
2 egg whites
4 large flat sweet onions, cut in 1/2 in. rings, separated

In a large mixing bowl, combine the flour, breadcrumbs and salt. In another bowl, combine the beer and the oil. Pour the beer mixture into the flour mixture, stirring with a whisk until just combined, do not over mix and let set for at least an hour. Heat at least 2 inches of oil in a deep fryer or large pot. While the oil is heating, beat the egg whites to stiff peaks and fold them into the batter being careful to not over mix. Dip the rings into the batter, then drop into the hot oil, making sure to not crowd them. Fry until golden brown. Drain on paper towel and serve. Don't salt before serving. Serves 6 to 8.

A bumper crop of books

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Anyone who cares about the state of contemporary Jewish writing should not neglect to read What the Furies Bring, a new book of essays by Toronto essayist-poet Kenneth Sherman (Porcupine's Quill)

By itself, Sherman's choice of subject matter is compelling. His essay topics include Yiddish and the Jewish Canon, Anne Frank and the Search for Self and Poetry and Terrorism, and he sets his critical sights on the likes of Ruth Wisse, Chaim Kaplan, Vasily Grossman, Primo Levi and John Updike. He also presents a charming and thoughtful remembrance of his grandfather and his family's early years in Toronto.

These are not mere belle lettres from a detached ivory tower. Perhaps one of the most pressing problems of our day, the phenomenon of terrorism and the "furies" unleashed upon the world by the perpetrators of 9-11 are a chief concern in these essays. The author explains his philosophy that literature "should address the most extreme circumstances" and be more than a "deceptive luxury."

Albeit unsystematically and using literature as the focus, Sherman's erudite criticism speaks directly to the problems that western civilization faces in the era of 9-11 The themes seem relevant and the writing clear and direct.

After a hiatus of several years, the 15th edition of Parchment, the journal of contemporary Canadian Jewish writing, has appeared, containing a bumper crop of short fiction, poetry, a couple of brief memoirs and an essay by outgoing editor Adam Fuerstenberg on Canadian Yiddish poetry between the two world wars.

Contributors include Anne Dublin, Renate Krakauer, Avner Mandelman, J. J. Steinfeld, Kathy Kacer, David Zvi Epstein, I. B. Iskov, Seymour Mayne, Isa Milman, Merle Nudelman, Elana Wolff and many others.

All Jewish writers, as well as all those who are interested in either Canadian or Jewish writings, should not hesitate to invest in this volume, not only to help support this worthy vehicle but also in anticipation of good things contained therein. Yom Kippur in Amsterdam is a book of stories by Maxim D. Shrayer. I read a few stories and – lo! – I wanted to keep on reading. Stories such as The Disappearance of Zalman and Trout Fishing in Virginia offer a frisson of pleasure when one realizes that one has been tricked into believing in an illusion and suddenly has the rug pulled out from beneath one's feet.

Shrayer's Jewish characters, like those of our native writer David Bezmozgis, blithely take the immigrant narrative into the 21st century. Like Bezmozgis, Shrayer is an émigré from the former Soviet Union whose writing seems to emerge from the traditions of Isaac Babel, Vladimir Nabokov and Isaac Bashevis Singer. He is a professor of Russian, English and Jewish studies at Boston College. The book is published by Syracuse University Press.

The acclaimed Ukrainian-Jewish writer Lamed Shapiro (1878-1948), who first came to the United States in 1905, led a life marked by marked by frequent ocean crossings, alcoholism and failed ventures: for years he sought an improved chemical process for colour-film development and was as obsessed with that problem as an alchemist might be seeking to transmute base metals into gold.

Yet somehow he managed to transmute the stuff of his chaotic life into a sort of literary gold. Preoccupied with grotesque and even horrific violence, Shapiro wrote about pogroms, rapes, murders and terror as the Jewish people were exiled from the outmoded shtetl and set adrift in the modern world.

The Cross and Other Stories, a new collection from the Yale University Press, is a fresh presentation of some of Shapiro's controversial short stories, set in both the Old World and the New World environments of East Broadway and the Bronx, Union Square and vaudeville. The collection is admirably edited by Leah Garrett, associate professor at the University of Denver, whose introductory essay overflows with marvellous insights:

"Peretz was the last of a generation of Jewish writers who could be all things to all people," Garrett writes. "The next generation went down two separate paths: the lyrical impressionists in one direction, the naturalists in another.

"The latter – Schneour, Opatoshu, Weissenberg, Warshawski – sought their subjects on the margins of Jewish society, among horse thieves, peddlers, Jews who were all brawn and no brains, and portrayed a gallery of unsavoury characters governed by their passions and victims of their environment. Shapiro the impressionist went them two better, by describing the transformation of a sensitive intellectual into a man of iron and by exposing the brutalized inner landscape of an illiterate, speechless Ukrainian peasant."

Roughly a decade after her debut novel Fugitive Pieces collected an extraordinary number of prestigious literary prizes, Toronto-based author Anne Michaels returns to the book charts with her second novel, The Winter Vault, published by McClelland & Stewart.

As before, the writing is as lyrical and exotic as anything in the Ondaatje school of literature that inspired it. The story focuses on a Canadian couple involved in the relocation (and hence rescue) of an ancient Egyptian temple at Abu Simbel before the rising waters of the Nile in front of the newly constructed Aswan Dam. By night, the couple retreat into their individual pasts – he to his childhood in England during the war, she to her childhood with her schoolteacher father, travelling the shores of the St. Lawrence seaway.

Reminiscent of The English Patient, The Winter Vault will undoubtedly be devoured with great relish by the many fans of Fugitive Pieces, perhaps without a concern that the finely wrought prose seems derivative, overly precious and at times obscure.

I noticed only recently that the New Canadian Library, an imprint of McClelland & Stewart, has resumed reprinting tried-and-true Canadian classics as in former days. Titles include one of the great landmark volumes of Canadian Jewish literature – The Sacrifice, by Adele Wiseman, first published in 1956 and well deserving of a new readership.

Wiseman's solemn, neo-biblical immigrant saga of three generations of a Jewish family in Canada won the Governor General's Award for literature when it first appeared. Although it seems a relic of an older, more conventional school of writing than we're used to today, Wiseman writes with enormous sensitivity and talent. M&S has put the novel into an attractive package featuring an afterword by Anne Michaels.

Yellowknife singer-songwriter represents N.W.T. in CBC song contest

By CARA STERN
Special to The CJN

Dana Sipos may have won a spot representing the Northwest Territories in a CBC music contest, but she says she never sought a musical career.

"It just sort of evolved from learning to play a couple of chords," says the 25-year-old singer-songwriter.

"I've always been singing and writing lots and then I started songwriting, getting more confident, and sharing it with people."

Sipos was voted to write a song about the Northwest Territories as part of CBC Radio Two's Great Canadian Song Quest.

The annual contest asks Canadians to nominate their favourite locations in the country to be celebrated in song and then vote for a singer to represent each province and territory.

On Dec. 15, Sipos will debut her song during a Toronto concert with the other winners, which will broadcast across the country.

"It was really exciting and a little bit surprising," she says, about being selected to represent the Northwest Territories.

Born in Hamilton, Ont., Sipos has lived in Yellowknife since 2003, although she says she has moved around quite a bit since then. A few years ago, she spent six months living in Israel.

She lived in several places, including on Kibbutz Lotan in Arava Valley, which is north of Eilat.

There, she took part in a green apprenticeship program, where she earned a certificate in permaculture – designing settlements and agriculture so as to reproduce the natural environment.

"I loved living on the kibbutz," she says. "I improved my Hebrew a lot, and living in the desert is pretty magical."

Living in Israel is a stark difference from living in Yellowknife, where there are only "a small handful" of Jews, Sipos says.

"I miss being part of a vibrant Jewish community and having people at Shabbat," she continues, adding that she does celebrate the holidays with friends.

"They will have Purim parties and Chanukah parties, and they just try to open it up and welcome anyone that's interested to come."

There are no synagogues in the city, she says, and it is sometimes challenging to be a Jewish woman living in the Northwest Territories.

However, Sipos says her surroundings greatly influence her music. Many of her songs, she says, tell stories about the north.

"There's the magic up here, like the midnight sun and the Northern Lights.

"It's also what the trees look like at 40 below and what it feels like at 40 below."

Although she describes her music as northern folk/roots music, she admits her last album explored many genres, including blues, jazz and bluegrass. She says she is first and foremost a singer-songwriter.

She lists some of her musical influences as being the artists she listened to growing up, among them Joni Mitchell, Bob Dylan and Leonard Cohen.

"People that tell stories with their music have always been an inspiration," she says, adding she is also influenced by some younger artists.

Sipos plays the guitar, mandolin and the kazoo.

She says living in the Northwest Territories has helped her progress as a musician.

"There's a really supportive music community, so there were people to nurture those songwriting skills and hone them," she says.

"There's a really artistic community and musical community, and a collection of all sorts of people and characters coming to the north for an adventure, so it's fun living up here."

She describes the community as unique. "There's a cross-section of people from all over the world," she says. "[Yellowknife is] right on the edge of Great Slave Lake, so you feel like you're right at the edge of the wilderness."

She also says that, ironically, living in Yellowknife has given her opportunities to further her musical career.

For example, in 2007, she won another CBC singer-songwriter contest to represent the Northwest Territories in the True North Concert Series – a competition for artists living in Canada's north.

She will be representing the Northwest Territories again as part of CBC's Great Canadian Song Quest, in which listeners voted for one artist to represent each province and territory.

There were five possible locations for her to write about.

Through a public vote, it was decided that her song would be about the pingos – cone-shaped hills filled with ice – located in Tuktoyaktuk, a settlement north of the Arctic Circle, inside the Inuvik region of the territory.

In Inuvialuktun, an Inuit dialect, Tuktoyaktuk translates to "it looks like a caribou."

Sipos says she refers to this idea in the song and took a poetic approach to it.

"I tended towards the mystery and ancient legends boxed inside the pingos," she says. "I talk about how they have hearts of ice."

She says she tries to give geographical context and understanding of the pingos in the song, and to express why they're magical, as well as their importance to the community.

"They've been used for centuries as navigational guides. People would go on top of the pingos and be able to see into the distance to check for whales or caribous."

A few years ago, she could not have imagined achieving this much success, Sipos says.

"I probably wouldn't have been able to imagine that I would have these opportunities," she says, adding that she is excited about flying to Toronto for the Dec. 15 concert, which is taking place at the Glenn Gould Studio.

She says she hasn't really set any specific goals for the future, although she hopes to perform in more folk festivals next summer, as well as record a new album next year.

"I'm just going to keep playing music, and if people are enjoying it and I can travel with it and spread a little bit of a message, then I'm happy."

Iranian lawmakers threaten nuclear watchdog

JTA

TEHRAN — Iran's parliament threatened to reduce its co-operation with the United Nations nuclear watchdog agency and approved plans to build 10 new uranium enrichment facilities.

Sunday's call by Iranian Parliament Speaker Ali Larijani to "form a new type of relationship with the West," backed by a statement from lawmakers read in parliament, comes two days after the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) board of governors voted to censure Iran for building a nuclear enrichment facility in secret and demanded it freeze its nuclear enrichment program.

"If the West continues to pressure us, then parliament can review Iran's co-operation level with the IAEA," Larijani said.

The Iranian parliament ordered the government in 2006 to cease co-operation with the IAEA after the agency reported it to the UN Security Council, according to reports.

Last Friday's IAEA resolution, which passed 25-3 with six abstentions, was significant because it was backed by all six major world powers, including Russia and China. Both of those countries have been reluctant to go along with western efforts to sanction Iran for its nuclear program, although it remains unclear if the vote signalled that Russia and China would support further punitive measures.

The only three countries to vote against the resolution were Cuba, Venezuela and Malaysia.

Iran's chief delegate to the atomic agency, Ali Asghar Soltanieh, told the meeting that the resolution would not change Iran's plans, according to media reports.

"Neither resolutions of the board of governors nor those of the United Nations Security Council, neither sanctions nor the threat of military attacks, can interrupt peaceful nuclear activities in Iran, even a second," he said in remarks made available to reporters.

Israel commended the passage of the resolution.

"The importance of the resolution is in its determination that Iran is continuing to defy the resolutions of both the Security Council and the IAEA board of governors, as well as its expression of concern over the fact that Iran is building its enrichment facility in Qom in secret," said Israeli Embassy spokesperson Jonathan Peled. "The demand to immediately halt the construction of this facility is of extreme importance."

On Nov. 26, IAEA head Mohamed ElBaradei told a meeting of the agency's 35-nation board of governors that the IAEA investigation into Iran's alleged nuclear weapons program is at "a dead end" due to Iran's lack of co-operation.

ElBaradei stepped down on Monday as agency chief.

Iran last week rejected a plan brokered by the Vienna-based agency, under which Iran would relinquish the bulk of the uranium it had enriched to low levels, sending it to Russia and then France for further enrichment; it then would be returned to Iran. Six world powers, including the United States, had endorsed the deal.

In a counter-offer, Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Ramin Mehmanparast said in a news conference Nov. 24 that Tehran would send its low-enriched uranium abroad for further enrichment if it received 20 per cent pure uranium processed abroad at the same time as a guarantee, according to reports.

In related developments, Iranian state radio reported Sunday that the country's parliament has approved a bill earmarking $20 million to support militant groups opposing the West.

It was not immediately clear which groups would receive funding from Iran, but Tehran already backs the Islamic militants Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Gaza Strip.

The report says the money will also be used to investigate alleged U.S. and British human rights abuses and plots against Iran.

State radio said Sunday a committee that includes representatives from the intelligence and foreign ministries will decide how to divide the budget.

The move is seen as a reaction to U.S. and British criticism of Iran's violent crackdown on protests after the disputed June presidential election.

Trial of alleged Nazi guard Demjanjuk starts in Germany

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

MUNICH — The trial of John Demjanjuk, an 89-year-old former alleged Nazi camp guard, started on Monday on charges of helping to force 27,900 Jews into gas chambers in 1943.

John Demjanjuk

Demjanjuk, a retired U.S. autoworker, appeared in a wheelchair before a court in Munich at what is possible Germany's last major trial from the Nazi era.

German state prosecutors believe Demjanjuk, who was at the top of the Simon Wiesenthal Center's list of most-wanted war criminals, assisted in killings at the Sobibor Nazi death camp, in what is now Poland, where at least 250,000 Jews were killed. He faces charges of being an accessory to the murder of 27,900 Jews at Sobibor.

"There can be no statute of limitations on crimes committed as part of the Holocaust," the Anti-Defamation League said a statement. "While no trial can bring back those that were murdered, holding those responsible to justice has an important moral and educational role in society."

Jewish groups and victims' families say it's never too late for justice to be done and that the case is symbolic.

"We should not make the mistake of thinking that a case against one war criminal is a case against just one man," said Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean of the Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles.

"When the bell tolls for John Demjanjuk, it is also tolling for every other war criminal, even if it just gives them sleepless nights," he told Reuters.

Nearly one hour after the scheduled 9 a.m. start time, a long queue was seen outside the court building.

It's the second war crimes trial for Demjanjuk. In 1988, Israeli courts convicted and sentenced him to death for murder and savagery at the Treblinka death camp. But the sentence was overturned in 1993 when the Israeli Supreme Court determined there was insufficient evidence that Demjanjuk was the so-called guard named "Ivan the Terrible," and he was released.

Today, prosecutors say they have all the proof they need that he actively participated in the mass murder of Jews in the gas chambers of Sobibor in 1943.

"The totality of evidence is overwhelming," said Barbara Stockinger, spokesperson for the state prosecutor in Munich.

An SS identification card places Demjanjuk in the death camp, and his number shows up on many documents related to Sobibor.

The prosecution alleges that Demjanjuk, after being captured by the Germans in 1942, received training at the Trawniki SS facility in occupied Poland, which produced guards for several death camps.

He insists he merely served in the Soviet army and was captured by Germany in 1942.

Demjanjuk was extradited from the United States last May and stripped of his citizenship.

His case has attracted interest from international media, and angry scenes erupted in Munich ahead of the trial, as reporters fought over the 68 spaces available for the press in the courtroom.

Demjanjuk, who was born in Ukraine and fought in the Red Army before being captured by the Nazis and recruited as a camp guard, immigrated to the United States in 1951, becoming a naturalized citizen in 1958.

He denies he was involved in the Holocaust and his family insists he is too frail to stand trail. Demjanjuk's son said his father had been in hospital for five days in the week prior to the trial to undergo a range of tests and had a blood transfusion due to a bone marrow disease.

"They are forcing the trial to go forward regardless of my father's condition," John Demjanjuk Jr. told Reuters.

Due to his weak condition, the hearings will be restricted to two, 90-minute sessions per day. His lawyer said Demjanjuk was in constant pain and suffered from periods of mental absence.

The trial is expected to last until May – although some estimate it could take up to two years – and sessions were scheduled for three days this week. More than 200 journalists have been accredited.

If all goes according to plan, the prosecution will have read the charges on Monday and Demjanjuk will have had the chance to respond. Prosecutors planned to show the court documents, including an identity card, to prove he was at Sobibor and will call about 20 witnesses.

If convicted, Demjanjuk faces several years in jail – reportedly a maximum of seven, which could mean he'll spend the rest of his life behind bars.

For some in Germany, the trial is reminiscent of the first major postwar trials of Nazis by Germans, including the Auschwitz trials of 1963-65, when Germany put 22 citizens on trial for their roles as mid- and lower-level officials at Auschwitz. The trials served to wake up the postwar generation to the horrors their parents had tried to forget.

In contrast, the Nuremberg trials, which took place immediately after the war, were conducted by the Allies and seen by many Germans as victors' justice.

"I felt then, and I feel now as an older man, that these trials [in German courts] are important," said Wolfgang Benz, director of Berlin's Center for Research on Anti-Semitism.

As a history student, Benz observed the trial of high-level SS member Karl Wolff in Munich in 1964. Now his daughter, Angelika, a doctoral student and expert on the Trawniki SS camps, is planning to attend the Demjanjuk trial.

"There is no statute of limitations for the crime of murder. It doesn't matter if this old guy is sick or if he is nearly 90 years old," Benz said. "The issue of dealing with our past will never end, and Demjanjuk is the case for today."

Although he has acknowledged being at other camps, Demjanjuk denies being at Sobibor, which prosecutors say was run by 20 to 30 Nazi SS members and up to 150 former Soviet war prisoners.

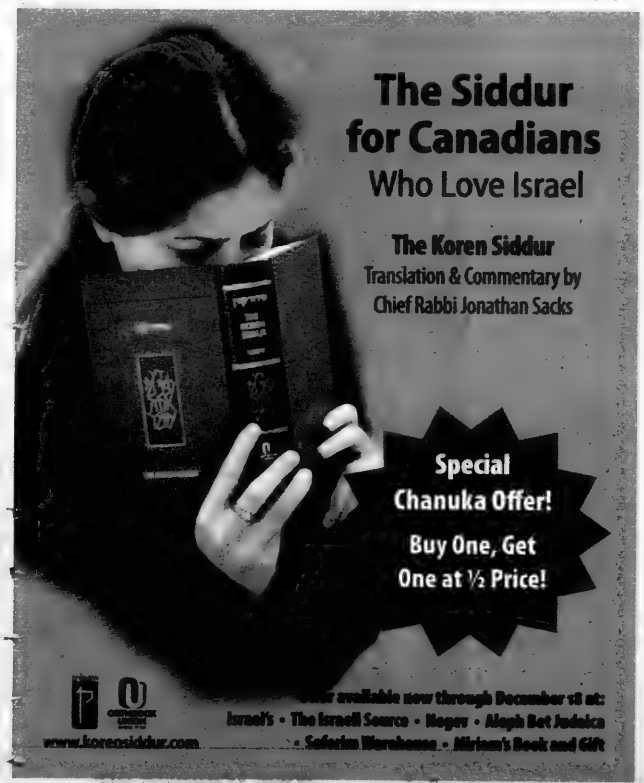
Prosecutors argue that Demjanjuk was at Sobibor for about six months in 1943. The key staff at the Nazi death camp in Sobibor were tried and sentenced four decades ago. The camp, set up in 1942 in Lublin district, existed solely to kill Jews. Research shows the complete toll was about 250,000. The gas chambers were first used to kill Polish Jews, then those from Germany, France, Czechoslovakia and the Netherlands. The buildings and compound occupied an area of 400 by 600 metres.

About 30 male members of the Nazi SS, ran the camp, assisted by 90 to 120 eastern European volunteers known as "Trawniki," because they had trained at an SS camp in Trawniki, Poland. Demjanjuk is alleged to have been one.

From 1965 to 1966, a court in Hagen, West Germany, tried 11 of the German SS guards from Sobibor. One committed suicide, one was given life imprisonment, five received terms of three to eight years and four were acquitted.

The camp commandant, Franz Stangl, was tried separately and sentenced in 1970 to life imprisonment. He died in prison.

A group of inmates kept alive to do menial work mutinied in October 1943 and about 300 managed to escape into nearby woods. Most were caught and killed by the Germans, but 64 survived the war. After the camp revolt, the Nazis killed the inmates who were left and demolished the camp in 1943. There is a museum at the site today.



Israel bombs Gaza terrorists

Israel's air force bombed a group of terrorists in Gaza as they prepared to launch a rocket at Israel. Four Palestinians were wounded in the Friday morning strike on northern Gaza, according to reports. The launcher was also destroyed. The move comes less than a day after five mortar shells fired from Gaza hit an open area in the Negev, causing no casualties. Israeli soldiers also prevented a major terror attack last Thursday after identifying a man carrying a bomb along the Egyptian border. When the soldiers ordered the man to stop, he threw down the sack carrying the 33-pound explosive and disappeared into Egypt, according to reports. It is still not known whether the alleged terrorist was a Gaza resident who entered Egypt through a smuggling tunnel or a terrorist operating in the Sinai Peninsula. The bomb was likely meant to be used in Eilat or in a major central Israeli city.

Tourism funding for Jerusalem

Israel's Tourism Ministry has budgeted nearly $4 million for next year to develop tourism in Jerusalem. The 2010 funding is earmarked to develop tourism infrastructure in the city and to promote tourism events both domestically and abroad, according to the Tourism Ministry. In recent years, the ministry has invested millions of dollars in developing and improving the tourism infrastructure in Jerusalem, including the centre of the city, Ein Kerem and the Old City. According to the ministry, 74 per cent of tourists to Israel visited Jerusalem, with 53 per cent spending at least one night in the capital and an average of six nights. The most visited sites within Jerusalem are the Western Wall, the Jewish Quarter, the Mount of Olives, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the Via Dolorosa, the Tower of David and Yad Vashem.

Venture capital magnet

Israel is the most attractive country in the Middle East for venture capital and private equity investment, according to a new survey. Israel comfortably beat regional competitors United Arab Emirates and Saudi Arabia to rank 22nd overall in the Global Venture Capital and Private Equity Country Attractiveness Index, which was published recently by global accountants Ernst & Young.

The index measures a country's attractiveness to outside investors based on its social, cultural and economic environment, taxation, governance and business infrastructure. Israel showed a major improvement in taxation since the first survey four years ago and also scored high marks for fostering entrepreneurial opportunities. But the country slipped in the human and social categories as a result of an unstable security situation.

Paul Anka rocks Tel Aviv

Paul Anka performed last week in the Nokia Stadium in Tel Aviv. Ha'aretz reported that "Anka rocked the stadium, devoured the stage, and redefined what it means to give the audience its money's worth. Anka made a symbiotic connection with his audience, which was felt from the very first two songs he performed standing in the crowd."

Netanyahu ill, cancels Germany trip

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu cancelled a joint cabinet meeting in Berlin after being diagnosed with a viral infection. The trip scheduled for Monday by Netanyahu and six other cabinet ministers was cancelled several hours before a scheduled flight to Berlin. The prime minister felt ill Sunday evening and was examined by his physician, who diagnosed a viral infection and a mild fever and recommended that he rest at home, according to a statement from the Prime Minister's Office. The inter-governmental meeting, a reciprocal visit to one made by the German cabinet in March 2008, was postponed until January. The cancellation came several hours after Netanyahu delivered a speech in Eilat to mark the Nov. 29 anniversary of the UN vote to create the State of Israel. Germany is currently negotiating in conjunction with Egypt to secure the release of captured Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

Israel said willing to release 980 prisoners

The newspaper also said Israel would not agree to release five female Palestinian inmates sentenced to life in prison or other extended terms, even though their names were on the original list of 450 "heavy" prisoners set to be exchanged.

These female inmates included Ahalam Tamimi, who was Abdullah Barghouti's right-hand woman and helped carry out the deadly suicide bombing at the Sbarro pizza restaurant in Jerusalem.

Meanwhile, Schalit's father said Monday that he has received no word of new breakthroughs in negotiations to secure a deal for his son's release. Schalit was abducted in 2006.

Noam Schalit, who has recently held a series of meetings with cabinet ministers, said he himself is "not concerned with whether the number of prisoners to be released is disclosed," despite ongoing debate in Israel regarding the role of censorship in the prisoner swap debate.

On Sunday, the state prosecutor's office declared that Israel would release 980 prisoners in exchange for Schalit. The announcement came in response to a petition filed by the parents of terror victims.

Israel and Hamas have promised the German mediator negotiating the exchange that the names of inmates released would not be disclosed, in order to ensure productive negotiations without media interference.

The petition, filed by three bereaved parents in conjunction with the Almagor Terror Victims Association, asked to lift military censorship over the developing deal for Schalit's release. The High Court will hear the petition Monday afternoon.

The state prosecutor responded that Israel is weighing the option of freeing 450 prisoners in the initial stage of the deal, "based on security and moral justifications." The unilateral release of 530 more prisoners, to be selected by Israel, is being planned for a later date as a gesture to the Palestinian people. Drafting the criteria for the second stage has yet to begin, and a potential list of inmates not been compiled.

The state prosecutor wrote that unlike a prisoner release representing a diplomatic agreement or goodwill gesture, the current negotiations for Schalit are tantamount to "an ongoing terror attack" in which Israel is "bargaining" to reach a deal that would exact the lowest possible price.

If an agreement is reached, the state prosecutor said, it will come only after the government has considered all of the implications of such an exchange, both moral and practical.

He added that as talks progress and both parties reach an agreement on which inmates to release, a list of names will be publicized.

The response also noted that the IDF Military Censor unit is entitled to prohibit the publication of any piece of information it believes "will significantly damage the possibility of returning Schalit alive and healthy," or if it believes publication will compromise national security.

Moreover, the response said, it is virtually impossible to hold public negotiations with a "bitter enemy," a terrorist organization holding a soldier captive and seeking the highest possible price in return for his release.

The state prosecutor wrote that ambiguity is essential to Israel's very existence, and that without this, "it is impossible to hold effective negotiations and reach the goal of returning the abducted soldier to Israel."

Curator navigates Jewish and Mohawk ancestry

Works confront tough issues

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

Although Steven Loft has been described as a "Mohawk-Jewish curator," he doesn't like labels and doesn't understand why people feel compelled to slot others into neat little compartments.

Loft – who is completing a two-year position as curator-in-residence for indigenous art at the National Gallery of Canada, the Ottawa gallery's first ever – believes we're all a combination of identities and experiences, although his a particularly interesting mix.

Born in Hamilton in 1960 to a teen mother whose parents were Holocaust survivors, Loft spent his early years living with the Jewish side of his family. He was only three years old when his parents separated, leaving him and his mother to move in with his grandparents. For the rest of his childhood, he never saw or heard from his father again. He later discovered that a drinking problem – later overcome – led to their estrangement.

"Both of my grandparents were born in Germany, but they met in London, where my mother was born. She was seven when they came to Canada and settled in Hamilton. Most of their families died in the Holocaust," said Loft.

"My grandmother was from Bonn and was very cultured... when they later moved to Montreal, I used to spend my summers with them, and we would go to galleries and plays together. She took me to Stratford. She was the one who got me interested in the arts... my grandparents were very important in my formative years."

In terms of career choice, however, Loft was looking in another direction.

His goal was to become a chef, but fate intervened in the form of a debilitating illness that left him unable to use his hands. Progressive systemic sclerosis, a rheumatic disease, can be life-threatening. Fortunately for Loft, he went into remission, but was forced to change careers.

While studying sociology at McMaster University, he worked as a restaurant manager, but he knew that was not the long-term career for him. He loved to write and began to learn more and more about his Mohawk heritage, leading him to find a way to combine the two.

Steven Loft discusses a painting at the National Gallery.

Up to that point, Loft had not had any contact with his father or anyone else from that side of his family. In an indirect and winding way, the illness led him to rediscover the connection.

Determined to earn his living writing, Loft freelanced, wrote for an aboriginal newspaper out of Manitoba and applied for what would be a life-changing job at an artist-run centre called the Native Indian/Inuit Photographers Association (NIIPA.)

Not only did this launch his new career, but the centre's director introduced Loft to another employee with the same last name who turned out to be his uncle from Six Nations.

Through the uncle, Loft was able to reconnect with his father and meet other family members.

As he continued to learn about and become immersed in his Mohawk heritage, Loft found what he considered to be a common horror of the Jewish and aboriginal peoples – the faceless numbering system used for the Jews during the Holocaust and Canada's assigning of Indian status numbers.

He had his own Indian status number tattooed on his arm, as "an act of defiance to the numbering of aboriginal people in Canada. Putting it on my arm was a subversive, political act," he said.

He also created a performance piece that became a video work called 2510037901, Loft's Indian status number. The piece was shown at various film festivals with very varying reactions.

"When I showed it at a Jewish film festival in Hamilton, the response was quite different. Even being Jewish, I had to talk about my family history and have a discussion about what has happened to aboriginal people. We had an interesting discussion about genocide and the kinds of acts that are committed against people," he said. "When I show it to aboriginal audiences, they just see the status number."

Loft sees such works as a way of confronting tough issues.

"Oppression and genocide are things that occur, even today. As creative people, one way we deal with them is to make art. That is one of the reasons I love what I do... art has to challenge us to how we see each other. Culture is the foundation of who we are, but it has to acknowledge difficult, disturbing things... and it can also be joyous, celebratory, just beautiful," he said.

Loft used his time at the National Gallery to create two new travelling exhibits for the National Gallery's On Tour program. "Steeling the Gaze" was created in collaboration with the Canadian Museum of Contemporary Photography. It will begin touring in 2010. "Back to the Beginning" will go on tour in 2011. Both will tour across Canada, but schedules and venues have not yet been confirmed.

What's next for Loft? There are several possibilities for 2010, but right now, he says he's just looking forward to some time to relax, regroup and get ready for his next adventure.

Loft's Indian status number is tatooed on his arm.

Jacob the Giant saves the Lunchkins in Latkaland

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

It is so very appropriate that on the eve of the holiday of the Maccabees, we should meet a new hero: Jacob the Giant. (He isn't really a giant. His friends call him a giant because his bravery is gigantic.)

Karen Fisman, an imaginative Toronto writer, has introduced us to this fine, fabulous and friendly young fellow so we can read about his bravery at a time of year when Jewish youngsters and their families celebrate bravery and courage and miracles for eight, happy, delicious, candle-lit days.

An Adventure in Latkaland – A Hanukkah Story (Jora Books) tells the magical adventure of Jacob Stern.

Like most of us, Jacob is an unlikely hero. He is an "ordinary" young boy. He enjoys the food, the games, the togetherness and the fun of Chanukah. It is on the holiday, because of the holiday, that he inexplicably finds himself in a faraway world in a zany, far-out but perilous situation in which he is called upon to save the strange but ever-so-cute Lunchkins and their potato-producing world from near catastrophe.

But it is precisely because he is an "ordinary" fellow, that Jacob becomes a hero. Through his above-and-beyond courage, we eventually discover that though there is nothing ordinary about heroism, it is the "ordinary" people who become our heroes.

But Jacob is not the only hero in this story. And he is not the only one to show bravery and courage. He meets dreamy, golden Sarah the Strong and Oily the Lunchkin. Together they combine their considerable goodness and summon up all their youthful strength to defeat the "nasty, slime-green Hanukkah goblins with pointed ears and hideous faces."

The author, Karen Fisman, has woven a fantastical tale that is suitable for telling – or listening to – after dinner around the table or before bed under the covers. Thomas McAteer's bright and colourful illustrations help us see with our eyes the dramatic story that the author imagined in her mind.

There is only one place on earth that Jacob, Sarah and Oily's adventure could unfold. It is a place far more striking than and perhaps almost as beloved as ancient Judea in the time of the Maccabees. It is Latkaland.

After An Adventure in Latkaland goes back to the shelf, at least until next year, children and their parents can reach for the JPS Illustrated Children's Bible.

This book is wonderful if not also required reading all year round.

Published by the Jewish Publication Society in Philadelphia, it is a beautiful, enchanting, enhancing, exciting, thrilling, dramatic and electrifyingly rich book.

Ellen Frankel, the CEO and editor-in-chief of the Jewish Publication Society, has selected and written the 53 biblical stories that fill the work. She has done so with dramatic flair, clarity and a profoundly keen sensitivity to the age of her audience and the multi-layered messages of the many stories. Her retelling of the stories is age appropriate but never condescending.

Avi Katz, perhaps the most famous magazine and book illustrator and cartoonist in the Jewish world, provides a visual anchor for Frankel's riveting stories. The result is a creation of art.

Katz's illustrations are, paradoxically, haunting and calming at the same time. Some of the images seem to have been painted in 3-D; they almost lift off the page. Each drawing evokes strong feelings. Detail, mood, colour, shading and intricately varied impressions of light whirl together with remarkable emotional force.

Combined with Frankel's intelligent, concise writing, the illustrated stories are a beautiful introduction to the foundational nuggets of our tradition, as well as a stepping-stone, a bridge perhaps, to a lifelong quest for better understanding of the stories of our past that make us and have made us who we are.

AGO's 'King Tut' exhibit has a Jewish dimension

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When British archeologist and Egyptologist Howard Carter excitedly stumbled upon the tomb of the pharaoh Tutankhamun in the Valley of the Kings in November 1922, he was amazed, if not dumbstruck, by the dazzling array of funerary objects, ranging from a solid gold funeral mask to household furniture.

As he descended farther into the claustrophobic tomb that had lay virtually undisturbed for 3,000 years, he was asked by a colleague, "Can you see anything? He replied, "Yes, wonderful things."

David Silverman

It was an understatement.

Carter's discovery of a tomb whose resplendent treasures could only be imagined was the archeological find of the 20th century.

The newest exhibition at the Art Gallery of Ontario, "King Tut: The Golden King and the Great Pharaohs," provides a tantalizing glimpse of the famous cache Carter discovered almost 90 years ago.

The exhibition, organized by the National Geographic Society, Arts and Exhibitions International and AEG Exhibitions in co-operation with the Egyptian Supreme Council of Antiquities, is scheduled to run until April 18, 2010.

It features more than 100 precious objects from King Tut's tomb and from similarly ancient royal tombs and temples in Egypt, twice the number of artifacts that were on display at the AGO's last Egyptian show 30 years ago.

Most of them have never before been exhibited in North America, said AGO director Matthew Teitelbaum at a press preview.

Merneptah may have been the pharaoh who pursued the Children of Israel.

The objects, some under protective glass, others on raised platforms and still others fully exposed, range from figurines and statues to jewelry and sundry items such as a bed, a toilet seat, a fan, a model sailboat and golden sandals.

Tutankhamun – the boy pharaoh of the 18th dynasty who ruled for only nine years yet left a lasting legacy – is clearly the star of the show.

But two of his successors, Ramses II and Merneptah, who figure in biblical history and are of no small interest to Jewish visitors, are also given pride of place in the form of brooding black statues.

Before we proceed, a telling note about pharaohs. As an explanatory inscription observes, the word pharaoh comes from a Hebrew word in the Bible referring to a ruler in Egypt.

This word, in turn, is derived from an Egyptian phrase, per aa, which means great house, or royal palace, said the exhibit's curator, David Silverman, a professor of near eastern languages and civilizations at the University of Pennsylvania.

Ramses II, who reigned for nearly seven decades during the 19th dynasty, is commonly associated with the enslavement of the Children of Israel and their perilous crossing of the Red Sea, all recounted in the Book of Exodus, noted Ronald Leprohon, a professor of Egyptology at the University of Toronto.

According to Silverman, the story of the Exodus is mentioned only in the Bible, not in Egyptian texts, and is associated with a "a family of pharaohs" rather than a specific one.

In Islamic tradition, Ramses' 13th son, Merneptah, who succeeded him as the fourth ruler of the 19th dynasty, was supposedly the pharoah who drowned with his army of horse-drawn chariots as he pursued the Children of Israel.

As well, Merneptah is linked to the Merneptah Stele, or the Israel Stele, which refers to a military campaign in which "Israel has been wiped out" and "its seed is no more."

Leprohon said that the Israel Stele, now displayed in the Cairo Museum, represents the first ancient Egyptian record of Israel's existence, not as a nation but as a tribe or people.

Asked whether Jews lived in Egypt during King Tut's reign, Silverman replied, "A hard question to answer."

The Middle Kingsdom era witnessed the arrival of many foreigners to the Nile Delta region, he said.

During the New Kingdom period, when Egypt's borders expanded after military campaigns, Egypt's population of outsiders increased, he added.

"It is difficult to estimate how many of these foreigners remained in Egypt during Tutankhamun's reign and how many of those could be identified as Jews."

Silence about Holocaust is novel's theme

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Ami Sands Brodoff might never have written her award-winning novel The White Space Between (Second Story Press) if the New York native had not moved here with her family 10 years ago.

Just arrived from Princeton, N.J., they were unpacking boxes when her husband Michael came across a cassette tape. They put it in a player and suddenly his late mother's voice filled the room.

Brodoff had never met her mother-in-law; she had died in 1972 at the age of 52 when Michael was 16. He knew little of her experience during the Holocaust.

A native of the Carpathian mountain village of Slatinskedaly in what was then Czechoslovakia, Brana Hoch had grown up in a poor chassidic family, one of nine children. She would survive three concentration camps: Treblinka, Mauthausen and Buchenwald. Of her large family, only she, a sister and a brother survived the war, and they are also since deceased.

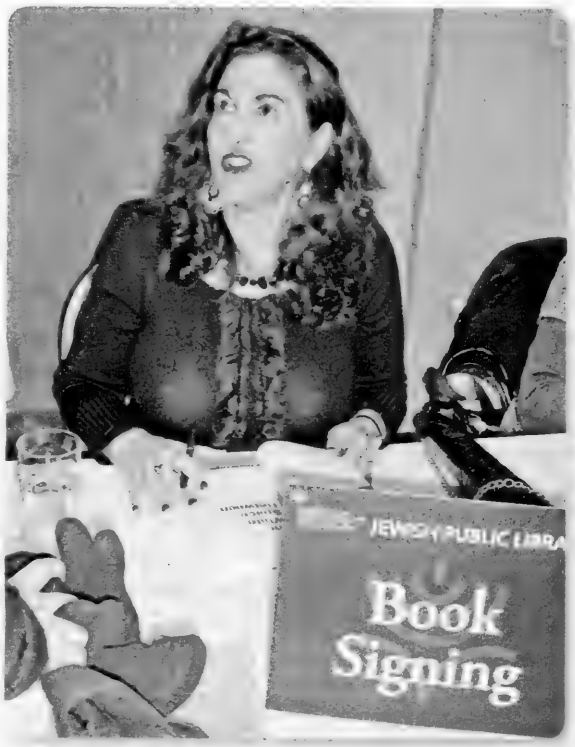
"It was as if she was right in the room, as if her voice had lived on beyond her corporal life," said Brodoff at Jewish Book Month in Montreal.

The White Space Between, which won the 2009 Canadian Jewish Book Award for fiction, is about a Holocaust survivor who tried to shield her only daughter from a painful past she pretends never happened.

Similarly, Brodoff's mother-in-law did not speak to her two children about what she had experienced.

"The novel was written in honour and in memory of her and the millions of others like her. It's a daunting task to write a novel about the impact of the Holocaust. How dare I write a novel when so many true-life tales are yet to be told?" said Brodoff, who spent a few years on the book.

Brodoff carried on because, as a fiction writer and teacher, she believes in the truth of literature. Readers can experience fictional characters' emotions in a way they probably cannot in histories, she said.



Ami Sands Brodoff signs copies of her novel The White Space Between at a Jewish Book Month event.

Brodoff's previous published works also have family, but not Holocaust, themes. They are the story collection Bloodknots (2005), which is peopled by orphans, strays and others who lost their family and must find it where they can; and her debut novel Can You See Me? (2000), which focuses on the impact of schizophrenia on a family. Brodoff said it is based, in part, on her own struggle to cope with the illness in a sibling.

The title The White Space Between refers to "the tension between void and voice" that characterizes Holocaust remembrance, as well as, of course, the blanks around words and sentences on a page, she explained.

The story, which is partially set in Montreal, is built on "the unbearable tension between silence and speech, remembering and forgetting, burying and excavating. It's a dance between these polarities…that is never resolved."

Her fictional character Jana, a native of Prague, has gone so far to cover up the past that her daughter, Willow, does not know who her father is, even if he is dead or alive. Instead, Jana recreates a palatable past through picture albums that are a mix of fact and fiction.

"It makes sense, it looks pretty (but)…it's a kind of hiding, a negation of the truth and identity," Brodoff said.

She describes the writing style she used as a "scrapbook collage," rather than a linear structure, that alternates between the past and present.

As she grows up, Willow takes up puppetry, using them to create a fantasy family, talking through them about things she can't discuss with her mother. The more her mother dissembles, the greater is the daughter's yearning to know.

Guilt is part of the reason Jana is so secretive. She was a registrar in Auschwitz, one of a pool of Jewish women assigned to type up the death certificates of prisoners, providing phony causes from a prescribed list of diseases. They were known as "secretaries of death."

The job allowed the women to survive, and they enjoyed such privileges as extra food and baths.

After the war, Jana settled in Montreal, and later near Princeton, N.J., and, as her creator says, "willed the suffering to fade" in her desperate search for a fresh start. She even gives herself a new anglicized name.

"My hope for this novel is that it will be a bridge, a force of connection, between the dead and the living, the lost and the found," Brodoff said.

German auctioneer drops sale of claimed Stern art

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — After a protest by Concordia University, a German auction house withdrew from sale a painting being claimed by the estate of the late Montreal art dealer and collector Max Stern.

The Lempertz auction house in Dusseldorf announced that the work by the Flemish artist Alexander Adriaenssen (1587-1661), a still life of fish, wasn't going on the block Nov. 21 as scheduled.

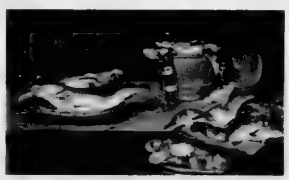
Lempertz's legal counsel, Karl-Sax Feddersen, told the media that it's now up to the owner to decide whether to enter talks on the painting's restitution to the estate, but the auction house is "ready to facilitate negotiations."

He said the still life is valued at between about $6,300 and $7,900.

Concordia, which has been spearheading the Stern restitution and education project for more than six years, complained to the media Nov. 20 that Lempertz was refusing to cancel the sale.

Lempertz is the same auction house that conducted the 1937 sale forced by the Nazis of the last 200 works in Stern's Dusseldorf gallery. The estate claims the Jewish Stern was coerced between 1935 and 1937 into liquidating some 400 paintings before fleeing Germany.

The Adriaenssen painting's resurfacing was brought to the estate's attention by the London-based Art Loss Register the week before the scheduled sale.



Immediately thereafter, the Holocaust Claims Processing Office in New York contacted Godelieve Spiessens, an expert in Belgian old masters, whose opinion is that the painting was one of the 200 auctioned off by Lempertz in 1937. The Lost Art Database in Germany also thinks it's the same work.

"The estate has repeatedly pleaded with Lempertz to recognize the validity of the estate's ownership of such looted artworks," said Clarence Epstein, who heads up the Stern restitution project.

On at least two occasions in the past, Lempertz refused to withdraw Stern art from auction.

Last year, a U.S. Federal Court ruled that the 1937 auction was indeed a forced sale and that all of the contents of the catalogue for that auction legitimately belonged to Stern and must be returned.

Concordia, along with McGill University and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, are the beneficiaries of the Stern estate. Stern, who died in 1987, owned the Dominion Gallery on Sherbrooke Street for four decades.

FIVE AUTHORS IN THE RUNNING FOR $100,000 (US) SAMI ROHR PRIZE

Five non-fiction authors have been named as finalists for the 2010 Sami Rohr Prize for Jewish Literature, the newest and largest monetary award of its kind. The top winner receives $100,000 (US), and $25,000 goes to the first runner-up. The prize is administered under the auspices of the Jewish Book Council. Winners are to be announced in January and a ceremony planned for Jerusalem on March 31.

The finalists are: Lila Corwin Berman, author of Speaking of Jews: Rabbis, Intellectuals, and the Creation of an American Public Identity (University of California Press); Ari Y. Kelman, author of Station Identification: A Cultural History of Yiddish Radio in the United States (University of California Press); Kenneth B. Moss, author of Jewish Renaissance in the Russian Revolution (Harvard University Press); Danya Ruttenberg, author of Surprised by God: How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love Religion (Beacon Press); and Sarah Abrevaya Stein, author of Plumes: Ostrich Feathers, Jews, and a Lost World of Global Commerce (Yale University Press).

Hailed as a transformative award for emerging writers, the prize honours the contribution of contemporary writers in the exploration and transmission of Jewish values. Fiction and non-fiction books are considered in alternate years.

Add a little spice to your winter vacation

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts and Travel Editor

ST. GEORGE'S, Grenada — Grenada is known as the "Spice of the Caribbean" because it's a leading producer of spices, including cinnamon, cloves and ginger, along with 20 per cent of the world's supply of nutmeg.

If you're visiting this southern Caribbean island, you will want to take a break from the white sands of your pristine, turquoise beach to buy some spices.

The best place to do that is at St. George's Market Square, in the heart of the capital city, St. George's.

The market is a colourful, bustling place and has been the main area for buying and selling produce for more than 200 years. A trip here affords you the opportunity to mingle with the friendly locals as they shop for their groceries.

The scents of cinnamon, ginger and the ubiquitous local spice, nutmeg, are immediately striking as soon as you step into the market. There are many vendors, mostly selling the same things, so they might appear aggressive, but they're never pushy. A simple, "No, thank you," and they turn away.

The vendors also tend to be camera shy and don't like tourists snapping pictures of them, but if you strike up a conversation with them and buy something, you'll be surprised how quickly they'll open up.

You can buy bags of nutmeg (ground or whole), mace (the stringy red covering of the nutmeg), cinnamon sticks, fresh bay leaves, cloves, bright yellow turmeric, vanilla and just about any spice you can think of at bargain prices here. Even lifestyle guru Martha Stewart has shopped for fresh spices in the market.

A spice necklace, to hang in your kitchen, is a great souvenir. You'll get a good deal if you buy two or three of these rings made from an assortment of aromatic spices.

Once you've finished spice shopping, venture out and see the rest of St. George's. It's a small and colourful city surrounded by the lush green hills of an old volcano crater and a horseshoe-shaped harbour.

Much of the city, as with the rest of the country, was severely damaged by Hurricane Ivan in 2004 and most of it has been rebuilt. (Canadian donations played a large part in the city's rebuilding.) Although it was devastating, in reality, hurricanes are rare here. The last major hurricane before Ivan happened 49 years earlier.

Take a guided tour of Fort St. George's to get your bearings. From up on the ramparts of this stone fortification, you can get an amazing view of the Carenage (the Inner Harbour) and the red-roofed buildings around it. The fort was built by the French in 1706 to ward off the British and is strategically placed over the harbour.

The fort is part of the island's recent history, too. It was here, in 1984, that its prime minister, Maurice Bishop, and some members of his cabinet were executed after a coup, which eventually led to U.S. intervention. The island's airport, just minutes away from St. George's, is named after him.

Once you've got a sense of the city's layout, head down to the Carenage, the main shipping area. You can walk along the shoreline or take a boat cruise of the harbour. Either way, you'll get a great look at the city's historic buildings and beautiful architecture that includes the Financial Complex, the 19th-century library and the hospital.

All of this is close to Grand Anse Beach, a three-kilometre-long resort area housing many of the island's guest accommodations, which includes such hotels as the moderately priced 240-room Grenada Grand Beach Resort to the more upscale 66-suite luxury Spice Island Beach Resort.

The beauty of Grenada is that everything is so close by. Only 345 square kilometres, it's made up of three islands – its sister islands are Carriacou and Petite Martinique – and has a population of just over 100,000. It's the most southerly of the Windward Islands, lying just north of Venezuela.

Grenada claimed its independence from Britain in 1974, and English is its official language. Like Canada, it is part of the Commonwealth and has a governor general as its head of state.

In high season (December to April), you can fly to Maurice Bishop International Airport direct from Toronto on Air Canada and Sunwing. During the rest of the year, you can fly to Barbados from either Toronto or Montreal and get a connecting flight from there to Grenada.

For more information on Grenada, visit www.grenadagrenadines.com.

Joseph Serge was a guest of the Grenada Board of Tourism.

American Jewish football player revolutionized the game

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In the early days of college football in the United States, the forward pass was discouraged by coaches, perhaps because the melon-shaped ball was so large that the majority of quarterbacks could not throw it.

Traditionalists argued that the forward pass would sissify the game, but others maintained that it would open up the sport, make it more exciting and reduce some of its gratuitous violence.

Murray Greenberg

As this debate raged, a number of coaches began experimenting with the forward pass. One of them was Fielding Yost of the University of Michigan. Yost's Jewish quarterback, Benny Friedman, helped revolutionize football by promoting the now familiar passing game.

As Murray Greenberg writes in Passing Game: Benny Friedman and the Transformation of Football (Public Affairs), an informative account of his illustrious career, Friedman revolutionized one of America's favourite pastimes, much as Babe Ruth changed baseball with his home runs and Bobby Orr altered hockey by popularizing the "offensive defenceman."

Friedman (1905-1982), the son of Russian immigrants from Cleveland, played for the University of Michigan from 1924 to 1926 and then turned pro, playing for the Cleveland Bulldogs, Detroit Wolverines, New York Giants and Brooklyn Dodgers in the National Football League.

In recognition of his contributions, he was inducted into the Pro Football Hall of Fame.

Hugely popular in his prime and the highest-paid player of his day, Friedman, standing five-foot-six and weighing 150 pounds, learned the game in high school in Cleveland.

As the author points out, Friedman was but the latest in a line of Jews who distinguished themselves on the gridiron. Phil King was a star at Princeton in 1893 and 1894. Sigmund Harris was an All-American at the University of Minnesota in 1903 and 1904. Joseph Alexander was an All-American at Syracuse University in 1917, 1918 and 1919.

Whether Friedman was inspired by these figures is impossible to say, but what is certain is that he was every bit as good, if not better, than them.

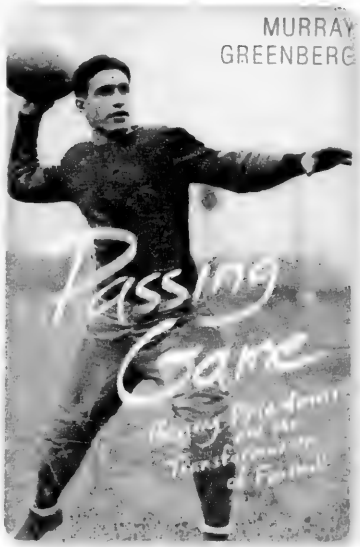
Friedman, who earned a spot as starting quarterback in his sophomore year, led the University of Michigan to great seasons in the Big Ten Conference league. Greenberg charts his career in such voluminous detail that only a diehard sports fan will value his meticulousness.

Like the lightweight boxing champion Benny Leonard, he was the embodiment of the "tough" Jew.

One publication cited by Greenberg, the American Jewish World, noted that Friedman's stardom helped challenge the stereotype of the Jew as a physical weakling.

As he puts it, "At a time when quotas limiting Jewish enrolment in universities were one stark manifestation of rising anti-Semitism, Benny's ascendancy offered the Jewish community some hope, if not assurance, that there was room for them after all."

By the time Friedman hung up his cleats at the University of Michigan, he was known far and wide and universally respected and admired.



"For all-around football smartness and football ability," the legendary sportswriter Grantland Rice wrote, "it is impossible to find a better man than Benny Friedman."

Friedman's coach was as effusive. "You were a bulwark to Michigan," he observed in a letter. "You were a great strategist, a thinker, a doer. You inspired, you calmed."

Buoyed by such glowing reviews, Friedman accepted an offer from the Cleveland Bulldogs – the 1924 NFL champion – to be their quarterback in 1927. The team's proprietor, Sammy Deutsch, figuring that Friedman would be a hit in his hometown, paid him a handsome salary.

He earned his keep.

Friedman had a successful season, not just in Cleveland, but in the other cities in which he played.

In one memorable game, he led the New York Giants to a 22-0 victory over a college all-star squad coached by none other than Knute Rockne, the coach of Notre Dame University.

Shortly afterward, he wrote The Passing Game, a book laced with football philosophy and personal recollections.

Friedman's days as a player were cut short by a knee injury in 1931. After his retirement, he coached the City College of New York football team, but since he had so little talent on hand, his teams could muster no more than mediocre records.

Leaving City College in 1941, he joined the U.S. Navy after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. He was posted to a training base near Chicago and then to a battleship as a gunnery and deck officer in the Pacific theatre.

Discharged from the navy after World War II, Friedman bought a Jeep dealership.

In 1949, newly formed Brandeis University asked him to head up its athletic program. Eager to get back into sports, he accepted the offer from its president, Abram Sachar, who felt that the university needed someone like him.

He had his work cut out for him. Since Brandeis had no real athletic facilities, Friedman spent much of his time on fundraising trips.

When the university ended its football program in 1960, citing prohibitive costs, he knew he had to leave. He resigned two years later.

After Brandeis, Friedman focused on a co-educational summer camp in Maine he had owned and operated since the mid-1950s and on his job as an insurance executive and occasional television colour commentator for the New York Jets and other NFL teams.

During the last decade of his life, Friedman's health failed him, says Greenberg.

He submitted to spinal and back surgery, had heart trouble and came down with diabetes.

Disheartened by his rapidly declining physical vigour, he committed suicide, 57 years to the day that he had been elected as the University of Michigan's first Jewish football captain.

At his death, astonishingly enough, he had still not made it into the Hall of Fame.

According to Greenberg, Friedman's egotistic personality had something to do with his exclusion.

But even his detractors could not deny that Friedman was one of the stellar figures in the pantheon of American college and pro football.

Injury forces Fichman out of Challenger tennis tourney

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

If not for an ankle sprain, tennis player Sharon Fichman of Toronto might have won both the singles and doubles titles at the $50,000 Tevlin Challenger event held recently at the Rexall Centre's indoor tennis facility at York University.

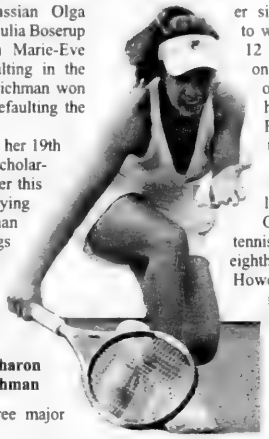
Teaming with American Mashona Washington and leading 3-2 in the doubles final match, Fichman fell trying to retrieve a ball and sprained her ankle. She tried to recover in the next point, but stumbled and was forced to default the final to Canadians Maureen Drake and Marianne Jodoin. Because of the ankle injury, Fichman also defaulted her semifinal singles match to Anito Kapros of Hungary the next day.

"It is tough to lose this way, but I am glad I tried to win before my family and friends watching me here," said a disappointed Fichman after the doubles final. "But I will be back again in the future."

Judging by her current results, the future looks bright for Fichman as a professional tennis player.

Before her injury, she didn't drop a set in either singles or doubles at the Tevlin Challenger. She defeated Russian Olga Puchlova 7-6(1), 6-1; American Julia Boserup 6-2, 7-5 and fellow Canadian Marie-Eve Pelletier 6-3, 6-2 before defaulting in the semifinals. With Washington, Fichman won three doubles matches before defaulting the championship match.

Fichman, who just celebrated her 19th birthday, turned down a tennis scholarship to Harvard University earlier this year to pursue a pro career. Playing full time for a year, Fichman jumped 175 points in the rankings to her current position as 126th in singles and 97th in doubles, and is third among Canadians and Jewish players on the pro circuit. In 2009, she also won two challenger single titles, twice as finalist, and went from qualifying into the main draw of three major women's top-tier tournaments.



Sharon Fichman

Fichman hopes to crack the top 100 on the women's pro tennis circuit. "I feel confident that I can compete against top players and hope to qualify into more top-tier events next year," she said.

Since becoming Canada's first tennis player since Carling Bassett to win the Orange Bowl 12 and under championship as an 11-year-old, expectations have been high that Fichman may become the next Bassett.

That hasn't happened yet, as Bassett, long acknowledged as Canada's best female tennis player, was ranked eighth by age 18 in 1985. However, tennis was mainly an American sport in Bassett's heyday and now Fichman is competing against the best players from around the world.

Nevertheless, Fichman is ranked higher than any other Canadian her age, and the upside is that she is just beginning her pro career.

"I felt for a long time that Sharon may become one of Canada's best tennis players, and I still feel that way," said Rene Collins, Canada's Fed Cup captain. "She is always confident and fights hard for every point, rarely beating herself. That attitude and work ethic go a long way to her success."

Taking up tennis at age five, Fichman had a stellar junior career, winning the Banana Bowl at age 15 and the prestigious junior Australian and French Open junior doubles titles in 2006, and setting a record as the youngest athlete (at 14) to win the gold medal in singles for Canada at the 2005 Maccabiah Games.

Fichman is also the youngest ever to represent Canada at a Fed Cup competition, in 2005, and she was on the national squad again in 2006 and 2009.

Fichman won her first pro title at age 15 in Israel, where her brother Thomas, once a top Canadian tennis player himself, resides. Fichman's Romanian-born parents emigrated to Canada from Israel in 1988. Fichman graduated from Forest Hill Collegiate Institute last year with an 88 average – a feat she is as proud about as her tennis.

"I can still go to Harvard later on if I want. This is my opportunity to prove what I can do in tennis and, by turning pro now, give myself a chance to be the best I can be," she said.

Operation Solomon leader inspires youths

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

It was May of 1991 and Micha Feldman was exhausted. He hadn't slept for two nights and hadn't eaten for two days. His blue shirt had turned brown with dust, and he had lost his voice. But he couldn't go home just yet.

Feldman, then the Israeli consul to Ethiopia, was in the middle of Operation Solomon, which was aimed at bringing Ethiopian Jews to Israel. After leading more than 14,000 Ethiopians on to 34 Israeli planes, Feldman arrived in Israel, tired, hungry, and determined to see the last plane land.

Micha Feldman

"Many [Ethiopians on the plane] recognized me. The moment they saw me, their eyes glittered. They called me Abba [Father] Micha. This is what I won," he said.

Feldman, now a volunteer at the Israel Crisis Management Centre, which helps newcomers and victims of terror, spoke at The House, a Jewish centre for youth, on Nov. 18.

Feldman told an audience of around 30 people about his first trip to Ethiopia in the 1980s. While walking to a small village, Feldman was spotted by a group of Ethiopian school children.

"Here, in the midst of Africa, a surprise happens. These children… open their mouths and spoke Hebrew," he said.

While planning for Operation Solomon, Feldman, who was in charge of organizing civilians, was faced with problem after problem.

"If you want to get the whole population of Montreal to Toronto, you have buses… private cars," he said. But in Ethiopia, there was only one bus company. When Feldman was able to secure about 20 buses from the company, he then had to organize thousands of people, who were placed in groups of 190 in the airport.

It was only until after the operation that Feldman understood its importance. While visiting Munich, Feldman and several colleagues went to the Dachau concentration camp. "There in Dachau it struck us – we understood the essence of the experience of Israel," he said.

During his talk, Feldman discussed life for Ethiopian Jews after Operation Solomon. "Their absorption is not easy. They are black in a white society. Most of the parents are illiterate in their own language, so we have to assist them in every facet of life," he said. "We, as Jews, can't allow ourselves to have a black underclass in Israel."

Jodi Katzeff, The House's program director, said Feldman's lecture was an important history lesson for the audience, which was made up of young people aged about 23 to 30.

"It's important for us to hear [lectures] like this. It keeps us connected to Israel," she said. "If you don't make an effort, you're never going to know."

David Goodman, who helped promote the event, agreed.

"[The lecture] was unbelievable," he said. "He captured the essence of looking after Jews. He's just so giving to everyone but himself."

Feldman presented a form of success that goes beyond material wealth Goodman said. "Here's a guy… who epitomizes another version of success. The fact that he's Jewish really reinforces the importance of the Jewish community."

Melissa Lass, 26, found Feldman's talk "very inspirational. I liked the personal touch of the stories. There's a lot that goes into planning and executing such a mission. It really touches so many people," she said.

CURRIED SWEET POTATO LATKES

1 lb sweet potatoes, peeled
1/2 c flour
2 tsp sugar
1 tsp baking powder
1 tsp brown sugar
1/2 tsp cayenne
2 tsp curry powder
1 tsp cumin
salt & pepper to taste
2 lg eggs, beaten
1/2 c milk
peanut oil

Coarsely grate sweet potatoes. In a separate bowl, mix flour, sugar, brown sugar, baking powder, spices. Add eggs and just enough milk to dry ingredients to make a stiff batter. Add potatoes and mix; batter should be moist, but not runny; if too stiff, add more milk. Heat 1/4"oil in frying pan until hot. Drop batter in by tablespoons, flatten with spoon. Keep turning often over medium heat several minutes on each site until golden. Drain on paper towels and serve. Yield: 16 pancakes.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

SHAAREI SHOMAYIM ON ST. CLAIR

Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, Toronto's largest Orthodox synagogue, broke ground to build its first shul on St. Clair Avenue West at Atlas Avenue in 1936, and the congregation worshipped in the basement until the main-level sanctuary was completed in 1948. Inset, an early sketch of the proposed building by architects Kaplan and Sprachman. One of its memorial windows was said to be the first in the world depicting the birth of Israel. The congregation moved north to Glencairn Avenue in 1966. Its former home is now a Hungarian community centre.

Understanding why we were insular

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Ve'ahavta was established, in part, because of the belief there was a need for the Jewish community to be less insular.

For many years following the Holocaust, the actions of our people on an international and humanitarian basis were clearly focused inward.

We fought arduously on behalf of Soviet Jews and we "purchased" men, women and children from Romania and Syria.

We worked hard to find peace and better lives for Shoah survivors.

In those days, while we strengthened ourselves by ourselves, places such as Cambodia and Biafra weren't on our "crisis radar."

All of this made sense, though. Six million of our people had just been murdered. Accounting firms and medical schools wouldn't accept us. Community centres banned us. Why would we trust the average non-Jew, and especially nation-state?

Furthermore, Jews were literally being held hostage all over the world awaiting our ransom payments, leaving few resources left over for others.

(The exception to this inward focus could be found in the State of Israel. In the early 1950s, Golda Meir launched Mashav, which was once the highest financed department in the Israeli Foreign Ministry. Mashav's mandate was/is to provide crisis relief, and medical and agricultural education and training internationally, particularly in Africa, regardless of a country's ties with Israel, if any.

Golda was wise. She understood that "friends" could be made on the ground in ways they couldn't be in the political arena. But it's important to remember, too, that Golda had a confident new country behind her.)

Despite all of this, however, I never entirely understood our mistrust of the "other" – that is until a recent meeting with a native Canadian activist and friend.

While we sat together and sipped coffee, I asked him if his community and mine could partner in a project, something geared to enhancing the lives of native Canadians.

His response was abrupt. Angrily, he stated that the native Canadian projects he oversees are doing fine and don't need any help from others. He added that he would no longer allow his people to be used by "the white man."

My friend then told me about family members and friends who were suffering terribly because of the horrendous pain they had experienced in residential schools. They are survivors. We are the white man.

It took me a few days to digest my friend's words. Initially I was hurt, as we had once worked together and accomplished a lot. I felt saddened knowing that, for him, as a Jew, I was like any other "white man" and thus responsible for much suffering.

But then I got it.

My friend was really telling me that "it's time for native Canadians to strengthen ourselves from within. Leave us while we do that. Just like you, the Jewish People, took care of your own, so will we.

"Just like you lost trust in the gentile, so have we in the white man."

I called him one night and told him: "I get it," and I let him know that he had helped me understand the Jewish People, and that I had been too critical of my own kind.

I told him that my offer to help really stemmed from my own need to do so, and that it was an imposition.

Sometimes it makes sense to be insular. We were, and we should allow others to be as well.

Sweden urges redivision of Jerusalem

European Union votes on proposal

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The European Union met in Brussels on the weekend and on Monday to discuss a Swedish proposal to divide Jerusalem and make east Jerusalem the Palestinian capital.

Prior to Monday's scheduled meeting, Israeli officials began pressuring EU foreign ministers to reject the plan.

The resolution reportedly says: "Europe calls for an independent, democratic, contiguous and viable state of Palestine, comprising the West Bank and Gaza, and with east Jerusalem as its capital. If there is to be a genuine peace, a way must be found to resolve the status of Jerusalem as the capital of two states."

Israeli daily Ma'ariv reported that the draft resolution also adds: "Europe has never recognized Jerusalem's annexation," and "the European Union will not recognize any changes to '67 borders unless agreed upon by both states."

Israeli President Shimon Peres and Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat recently joined the students at the all-girls Al-Mamunya High School in east Jerusalem's Sheikh Jarrah neighbourhood. Barkat sent a sharply worded letter to the members of the EU decrying the Swedish initiative to redivide Jerusalem. Please see related stories on pages 8 and 46. [Photo by Abir Sultan/Flash90]

Study estimates number of Israelis in Canada

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Fourteen per cent of Jews living in Canada originate from Israel, according to a recent study conducted by University of British Columbia graduate student Brent Harris.

By his estimate, 45,000 former Israelis currently live in Canada, but the real number may be 60,000, he acknowledges.

Harris, a native of Kingston, Ont., spent nine months studying Israeli immigrants in Vancouver for an MA degree in anthropology.

Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto, called Harris' figures basically correct. "They're similar to our own estimates."

Charles Shahar, a demographer who has worked as a consultant for the United Israel Appeal in Montreal, concurred with Harris.

"That's a good estimate of the number of Israelis in Canada, if Russian immigrants who left Israel are counted," he said.

> 14% of the community comes from Jewish state

Shahar, the chief researcher of a UIA national demographic study released in 2001, said there were 15,000 to 20,000 Israeli-born Jews, or sabras, in Canada as of about eight years ago.

The remainder of the Israeli immigrants in Canada classified as Israelis lived in Israel for a while, but were born outside the country.

Toronto had the greatest concentration of sabras, 10,000 to 15,000, Shahar said.

Montreal was home to 3,000 to 5,000 sabras, of whom some 1,500 were Sephardi Jews, while Vancouver had a population of around 1,000 sabras. The figure for Winnipeg was under 300.

Shahar said that the poverty rate among sabras was 18.4 per cent, a rate matched by non-Jewish immigrants.

Rotmans Honoured

TORONTO — Joseph and Sandra Rotman were honoured by the Association of Fundraising Professionals' Greater Toronto chapter at the group's award luncheon Dec. 2 in Toronto. Among the others receiving honours from the 1,200-member group were John Hunkin, the retired CEO of CIBC. The Rotmans have contributed significant sums to such places as Baycrest, the University of Toronto and the University of Western Ontario.

Iran Taunts Israel

TEHRAN — Israel can't do a "damn thing" to stop his country's nuclear program, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Dec. 2 in a televised speech. He cited the International Atomic Energy Agency's recent resolution calling the country's nuclear activity "illegal" and said it came "under pressure of a few superficially powerful countries." The resolution urged Iran to halt construction of a recently disclosed underground nuclear enrichment facility. In response, Iran's parliament approved 10 new uranium enrichment sites.

Comic Fights Zionism

PARIS — French comedian Dieudonné said he has secured funding from Iran for films that "combat" Zionism in France. Dieudonné and the head of France's Anti-Zionist Party told reporters they would "combat Zionism head-on" in France with films funded by unspecified donors whose support was obtained during a recent visit to Iran at a meeting with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, AFP reported. "We have received a significant budget that will permit us to make films at the level of those made by Hollywood, which is the armed branch of Zionist culture," Dieudonné said. He said Hollywood films influenced by the "American-Zionist axis" stigmatize Arabs. Dieudonné has been convicted and fined in the past for anti-Semitic statements.

Prof Slurs Israel

KIEV — A Ukrainian philosophy professor said that Israel has brought thousands of Ukrainian children into the country to harvest their organs. Vyacheslav Gudin told about 300 attendees at a Nov. 29 conference in Kiev that Israeli medical centres have used the children for "spare parts" in the last two years, Ha'aretz reported. The claim, which has been picked up by several Ukrainian websites, comes several months after a Swedish newspaper article claimed Israel's army killed Palestinians for their organs. During the conference, two professors also presented a book blaming "the Zionists"for the Ukrainian famine of the 1930s.

Chelsea Clinton Engaged To Jewish Man

Chelsea Clinton

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Chelsea Clinton is engaged to marry her Jewish boyfriend of two years.

Clinton, 29, the only daughter of U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton and former president Bill Clinton, became engaged over the U.S. Thanksgiving holiday weekend to investment banker Marc Mezvinsky, 31.

Mezvinsky, who works for Goldman Sachs, is the son of former U.S. Reps. Ed Mezvinsky (D-Iowa) and Marjorie Margolies-Mezvinksy (D-Pa.). The elder Mezvinsky recently served a prison term for swindling $10 million from investors in a series of Nigerian e-mail scams. He was released in 2008.

Mezvinksy and Clinton met in Washington in 1993, and both attended Stanford University. Clinton, a Methodist, was seen attending Yom Kippur services in September with Mezvinsky at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, where they both now live.

The couple announced their engagement Nov. 27 in a mass e-mail to friends.

Cemetery Ban Urged

ZURICH — A mainstream Swiss political leader is calling for a ban on separate Muslim and Jewish cemeteries. Christophe Darbellay, head of the Christian Democratic People's Party of Switzerland, made the statement in a TV interview two days after Swiss voters passed a measure to ban minarets. The anti-minaret initiative came from the opposition ultra-conservative Swiss People's Party and other right-wing groups. Critics say Darbellay wants to attract voters with similarly xenophobic measures.

Mob Link Probed

LOS ANGELES — Los Angeles police are investigating whether Israeli organized crime is connected to an attack at a local shul. Police initially listed the Oct. 30 shooting at the Adat Yeshurun Valley Sephardic Synagogue in North Hollywood as a hate crime, but in recent weeks they've been working on the theory that the shooting was to silence someone, the Los Angeles Times reported. Two men were shot in the legs in the shul's parking lot. Police believe one of them was the target. The synagogue has since increased security.

A Chanukah Reminder from Steeles Memorial Chapel

For many of us, Chanukah is a time to recall memories of time spent with family and loved ones.

Unfortunately, some seniors are left with only that ... memories.

If there's an elderly person whom you care for, visit, and light a candle with them. Make sure they're in good health, eating nutritionally and taking medication as prescribed.

It's amazing how a little love and caring can make such a big difference.

Pilot project aims to improve Russians' community ties

Launched in Ottawa, Calgary, Vancouver

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

Olga Chechelnitsky, centre with checked jacket, is seen at a JOLT event in Ottawa last week.

OTTAWA — It's long been recognized that Russian-Jewish immigrants to Canada have not been integrating into the organized Jewish communities as easily as newcomers from other countries.

Now a new pilot project aims to change that and encourage the former Russians to assume leadership roles in their local communities.

After two years of planning and development, the project was launched earlier this year by JIAS in Calgary, Ottawa and Vancouver. JIAS' Opportunity for Leadership Training (JOLT) branded the program "JOLT: Leadership Bridging Cultures." Beginning with eight monthly training sessions led by local co-ordinators and assisted by volunteers, it has a number of components designed to connect Russian Jews with local Jewish communities and to educate the communities about the Russian-Jewish experience.

Throughout the course, nine Ottawa participants were introduced to representatives of various Jewish organizations who explained how their agencies function, what their roles are in the community and what opportunities there may be within them for the Russians.

It was hoped that each of the Russians would find an organization that matched his or her interest and skill set and would become involved in the organization, and, by extension, the wider Jewish community.

An anniversary sadly noted

From the editor's desk...

Sixty-one years ago today, Dec. 10, 1948, the General Assembly of the United Nations adopted and proclaimed the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It's an anniversary we observe with the same emotions of irony and sadness that usually accompany feelings of irretrievable loss.

The hard-crusted cynicism, bordering upon outrage, that most of us feel today at the mere mention of the term "human rights" in relation to the United Nations and international law was matched some 61 years ago by an enveloping sense of hope and possibility that perhaps the adoption and dissemination of a universal declaration of human rights could steer individuals and nations toward a better world.

Born in the aftermath of the most grotesque of all abuses of human rights – genocide as high governmental policy and priority – it was hoped it could be a kind of legal preventive medicine against the recurrence of such abuses.

It is not only because of its causal connection to World War II that Jews have been among the strongest advocates of the importance of the international Declaration of Human Rights. From time immemorial, Jews have always been among the first on the ramparts in the fight to uphold human rights. We have done so from the very first days of our nationhood because of the teachings, the imperatives, in the Book – the Bible – that formed our nationhood.

Article 1 of the declaration states that "All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights." This proposition springs directly from the biblical statement that all human beings are created in the image of God. Whatever the latter phrase means and however it is interpreted, it cannot mean less than that all human beings are deserving of equal dignity and respect. It should also be noted, as an aside, that this biblical reference is the foundational underpinning for the notion of democratic governance, i.e., one person, one vote.

Similarly, the prohibition in the Bible against placing obstacles in the path of a blind person is, among other such biblical stipulations, the basis for provisions in most of our domestic human rights legislation establishing the duty to attempt to reasonably accommodate the special needs of another.

In modern times, especially after the Emancipation in the mid-19th century, Jews have been at the forefront of human rights movements wherever minorities sought the protection of fair application of the law.

A direct line, therefore, can be drawn and has been drawn by many, joining the universal humanitarianism of the Bible to the ethic and tone of the universal humanitarianism of the declaration.

Indeed, of the two individuals considered to have been most instrumental in bringing the Universal Declaration of Human Rights into existence, one was a Jew: the renowned French jurist and scholar René Cassin. In 1968, Cassin received the Nobel Peace Prize for his life-long dedication to the protection of human rights. The other individual was then-former first lady of the White House, Eleanor Roosevelt.

Eleanor Roosevelt and René Cassin in 1948.

In our own day and age and in our own community, it should be noted, Montreal MP Irwin Cotler has become a Réne Cassin-like figure, known around the world for his tenacious championing of human rights.

Given this historic, if not also millennial, affinity among Jews for the very idea of, let alone protection of, individual human rights, it is, therefore, with an extra measure of sadness that we observe the abuse and cynical misuse of the universal declaration today, particularly in the United Nations, an arena that is structurally stacked against fairness and due process in the consideration of any matters relating to the sovereign state of the Jews – Israel.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights contains 30 articles. It is a document of high principle and noble aspiration, written in a manner and for a purpose that strives to elevate the eyes of humanity toward a brighter horizon.

Of the 47 countries that comprise the UN's Human Rights Council, it is probably true to say that at least half – members such as Cuba and Saudi Arabia – violate each of the 30 articles every day, and always as the norm of life there. They pay no heed to the universal rights propounded in the declaration. It is alien to their method of government, to the purposes for which they govern and often to their culture.

Supporters of the Jewish state wring our hands at the blatant hypocrisy of these member nations and at the wholesale human rights fraud of the council. It is easy for us to despair. But as Cassin pleaded in 1969 in an essay titled The Fight For Human Rights, "We must not despair, but, on the contrary, call on all our reserves of courage, patience and tenacity. It took 2,000 years for the State of Israel to be reborn; far less time will be necessary before the Declaration of Human Rights… is at last effectively put into operation and becomes a reality."

As Jews know, where there is life, there is hope. And hope has been the sustaining spring from which we have sipped throughout our history. –MBD

'Virtually' all Mercaz services intact: Federation

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Despite a major downsizing 10 months ago and a cut to its budget, nearly all the services of the Centre for Jewish Education will remain in place this year, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto claims.

Federation's vice-president of strategic communications, Howard English, said a draft document addressing the mandate, structure and responsibilities of the new centre – formerly known as the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education, or the Mercaz, and before that, the Board of Jewish Education – has been written, and a final report is expected in mid- to late February, following several weeks of consultations with "education stakeholders."

"Virtually all of the services provided in the past by the Mercaz are intact," English told The CJN in an e-mail last week. He added that a "quality review and enhancement" consultation service has been "put on hold pending discussion with the schools."

Budget slightly cut

The centre's budget this year is approximately $12.6 million, compared to the Mercaz's approximately $13.8 million budget last year, English said. Tuition subsidies have been increased by $500,000, he added.

The budget reduction is due to a drop in administrative costs, notably salaries, English told The CJN.

There are other changes as well, but he maintains they aren't cuts in services or programs.

In March, federation announced that it would eliminate 10 full-time jobs and leave the centre with only four full-time staff in a move the federation said was intended to provide more direct funding to its beneficiary schools.

At the time, it wasn't clear which services provided by the Mercaz would be maintained.

A March news release stated that federation would embark on "a renewed partnership with community day schools by enhancing their capacity to provide direct education services, rather than receiving services supplied by the Mercaz."

Paul Shaviv, director of education of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, was hired in June to direct the committee that's restructuring the former Mercaz. He has been working for almost six months on the report that will outline the goals of the new centre, in consultation with Jewish educators and lay leaders, he told The CJN.

Among the changes that are occurring, instead of organizing a professional development day this year, the centre is providing grants to schools for professional development.

"As a service, professional development has not been cut, but it is being administered differently," said English.

Also, the centre now has only two part-time special education consultants, one for day schools and one for supplementary schools. Last year, there were four consultants.

"The number of people has been cut back. The service is still there," English said.

Rikudiya, the annual dance festival for students, and Zimriya, an annual song festival, are included in a list of this year's services that English provided to The CJN last week, although he cited them last spring as examples of services that might no longer be provided by the new entity.

At the time, he said that "the schools in consultation with UJA Federation [would] determine that they want to continue the Rikudiya and Zimriya...

"One school could take the lead in providing a program or service to the community, or it could be outsourced, for example, to the faculty of Jewish studies at York [University] or the University of Toronto. The principle is the schools themselves, in partnership with us, will be supplying direct educational services to the community that were supplied for them by Mercaz."

English told The CJN last week that extensive consultations have taken place about the services schools consider most important, and Rikudiya and Zimriya were among them.

He added that the Koffler Centre of the Arts and the Centre for Jewish Education are jointly organizing Rikudiya, and that a musical director has been hired on contract for Zimriya, as was the case last year.

Other items on the list of services that are being maintained include:

- the centre's media centre and pedagogic library;
- the Midrasha L'Morim (Jewish teachers' seminary);
- Board of Licence and Review;
- financial support for supplementary school professional development and for supplementary school family education;
- the Henry and Julia Koschitzky grant for day schools that provide tuition studies and offer classes in conversational Hebrew and Tanach at all grade levels;
- the Chidon Hatanach regional and national Bible contests, to be held in Toronto 2010;
- an annual creative writing contest
- a Jewish education information night for parents of prospective students;
- special education consultants for day and supplementary schools;
- administrative support and use of space for school professional council groups (principals and administrators).

Shaviv credited the centre's interim director, Chari Schwartz, for ensuring "that core activities of the centre have been able to continue."

Europe endangers possibility of peace

Israel is at a watershed moment in its diplomatic relations with the European Union (EU). As of this writing, the EU was debating a proposal by Sweden, the country that holds the presidency of the EU until next month, to officially recognize the redivision of Jerusalem with east Jerusalem as the capital of Palestine. The Swedish proposal also reportedly calls upon the EU to recognize a unilateral Palestinian declaration of independence.

The very launching of the Swedish initiative, quite apart from its potential fallout, will likely have far-reaching implications for Israel's relations with the Scandinavian country, if not also with the EU.

The proposal to redivide Jerusalem arose out of the annual report on Jerusalem prepared by European consuls in east Jerusalem and in Ramallah. Not surprisingly, the report harshly condemned both the government of Israel and the municipal government of Jerusalem regarding policies in Jerusalem that the Europeans allege weaken the Palestinian Authority and discriminate against Arab east Jerusalem residents. It was leaked to the media last week.

According to Ha'aretz, a significant portion of the report deals with Israeli archeological excavations in Jerusalem, especially near the Temple Mount. The newspaper noted the European consuls are upset that the excavations focus mainly on Jewish history. The report contains the following statement: "Archeology in this case has become an ideologically motivated tool of national and religious struggle carried out in a manner that modifies the identity and character of the city and threatens to undermine its stability."

What are we to make of the Europeans' pique over Jews exploring their own history in the very city that has been the centre of that history for some 3,000 years? Jewish archeological exploration in Jerusalem offends them! The consuls are bothered that Jews are confirming again and again through historically empirical evidence that Palestinian political and religious leaders lie when they deny a Jewish connection to, let alone a Jewish temple in, Jerusalem. The secretive, unsupervised digging and demolition of artifacts by the Waqf, the Muslim administrative trust that supervises the Mosque of Omar and environs, under the Temple Mount seems not to bother the consuls at all.

The Swedish-launched EU initiative urging the redivision of Jerusalem could have devastating consequences for the entire peace process. By proposing to jump over the need for bilateral negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians, the EU is effectively blessing the Palestinians' refusal to negotiate with Israel, rewarding them and further encouraging such petulant behaviour.

Why would any Israeli government ever again trust the EU?

And worse, why would any Palestinian leader ever again go through even the pretence of negotiating with the Israelis, when all they need do is await meddling fiats from the Europeans?

The Europeans have endangered the possibility of peace.

Conservatives, Liberal on Mideast

It must be election time. Letter writers Karen Mock and James Morton would have us believe that the "Conservatives and Liberals have much the same policy" when it comes to Mideast policy ("Inflammatory rhetoric for political gains," letters, Dec. 3). This unfounded assertion is diametrically opposed to their argument that "Canada can and should be perceived as a credible honest broker," as these writers appear critical of the Conservatives' strong support of Israel. While these writers are undoubtedly supportive of the state, there are very clear lines of demarcation between the Conservative Party of Canada's support of Israel and that of the previously governing Liberals. Any casual observer of the Canadian political scene would conclude that the Conservatives have made immeasurable strides in improving Canada's relationship with the state and the Canadian Jewish community. Thankfully, the Conservatives have moved the yardsticks considerably in this regard and are more than entitled to highlight the stark differences in approach from their predecessor Liberals, even if that may hamper support for the opposition Liberals.

Understanding Jewish self-hatred

Understanding Jewish self-hatred predates Karl Marx ("Anti-Zionist Jewish leftists are part of a line stretching back to Marx," Nov. 26). Actually, the rabbis who developed the Haggadah had a very good understanding of the contrary attitude that many Jews have toward Judaism and Israel. Just look at the "contrary child" who attends a seder.

Although "seek and thee shall find" may be a line from the New Testament, it aptly describes what has gone on in Jewish life. Those Jews who "get it" about Judaism and Israel, understand the messiness of everyday life, yet accept the demands, responsibility and challenges of being a Jew.

However, leftist Jews, who have been educated in the world of utopian theory, experience cognitive dissonance when they look at Israel and Jewish life. They focus on the negative. They look at themselves as being good people. They look at their motives and doctrines as being true. But they were raised in the West, which was founded partially on a guilt-based mentality, so someone else other than them must be the source of the problems in the world.

It is very easy to sound intelligent when all one has to do is criticize. A flawed Israel and world Jewry who practice Judaism is just such an easy target.

The frothing nature of their anti-Semitism is so great that I have just one question for most of these leftists: what was you relationship really like with your parents and grandparents? Your unhappiness with life is obnoxious.

Left-wing criticism of Israel

Your article by Sally Zerker, suggesting left-wing criticism of Israel has its basis in anti-Semitic comments by Karl Marx, is total nonsense ("Anti-Zionist Jewish leftists are part of a line stretching back to Marx," Nov. 26). Traditionally left-wing parties see themselves as parties for the underdog. Israel, though its efforts, has fortunately ceased to play that role, militarily, economically and socially. The Palestinians have replaced them in that sad role, oft through a remarkable ability to shoot themselves in the foot. However, it is legitimate to repeat, as former Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion warned, that occupation damages both occupier and occupied. It is legitimate to criticize actions of Israeli government or groups. It is legitimate to criticize the second-class status of many Israeli Palestinians and their state-funded services. It is an evasion to label these criticisms as anti-Semitic, and these criticisms are echoed by many Jewish Israelis, living in Israel.

Behind the scenes of UN Resolution 181

By BARUCH TENEMBAUM
Special to The CJN

We commemorated the 62nd anniversary of United Nations General Assembly Resolution 181 calling for the partition of what was left of British-ruled Mandatory Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab state on Nov. 29.

Coincidentally, a few days earlier, on Nov. 25, the world marked the 128th birthday of Nuncio Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli, later known as Pope John XXIII.

Baruch Tenembaum

Most people know that his papacy symbolized a warming of the relationship between the Vatican and the Jewish world. Fewer people are aware of Nuncio Roncalli's life-saving actions during the Holocaust, when he was the apostolic delegate in Istanbul.

While he served in Istanbul, Nuncio Roncalli saved thousands of Jews. As the founder of the International Angelo Roncalli Committee, the Casa Argentina en Israel – Tierra Santa and of the International Raoul Wallenberg Foundation, I am proud that these three NGO's have been actively researching Nuncio Roncalli's brave intervention on behalf of the Nazis' victims.

Even fewer people know that after the war, as apostolic nuncio in France, Nuncio Roncalli played an important role in trying to facilitate a positive vote for the then-upcoming proposal in the UN for the Partition Plan.

This was related to me by Yair Tsaban, a former minister in the government of Yitzhak Rabin. In the 1950s, Tsaban was the personal assistant to the late Moshe Sneh, who in 1947 held the senior post of head of the political department of the Jewish Agency in Europe. Sneh was then also in charge of the aliyah and the illegal immigration portfolio. It was Sneh who revealed Nuncio Roncalli's involvement, which many believe helped pave the way to the creation of the State of Israel.

In 1947, Sneh's boss, Moshe Shertok, (who would change his name to Sharet and who would subsequently become prime minister of Israel from 1953 to 1955) was worried about how the delegates from the Latin American countries in the General Assembly regarded partition.

For the partition plan to pass, a majority of two-thirds would be required. The Latin American countries were inclined to vote in favour of partition. Without their support, Shertok knew the motion would be rejected.

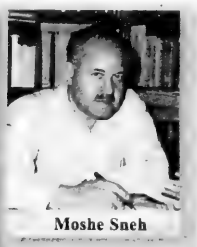
He had a great deal of concern about the influence the Vatican wielded on those countries, fearing especially that the Holy See would try to get them to vote against partition, in spite of their publicly expressed intentions to the contrary. Thus, Shertok called Sneh from Lake Success, N.Y., where the General Assembly was convening and instructed him to try to persuade the Vatican not to object to the presumed voting preferences of the Latin American countries.

Sneh was puzzled by Shertok's request. He confided to his assistant (in Yiddish): "How could I, Moshe Ben Shimon Klainboim [Sneh], from the small village of Radzin, possibly reach the Pope?"

Sneh turned to his friend, Abbé Alexander Glasberg, who had assisted in the illegal immigration efforts to Mandatory Palestine. Even during the Holocaust, Abbé Glasberg went out of his way to save Jews. Glasberg told Sneh that he knew who might help: "A great humanist who helped the Jews during the Holocaust." Abbé Glasberg then introduced Sneh to Nuncio Roncalli (who at that time was the nuncio in Paris).

Abbé Alexandre Glasberg

Cardinal Angelo Roncalli, later Pope John XXIII



Moshe Sneh

Sneh's meeting with Nuncio Roncalli was conducted in a warm atmosphere. Roncalli promised he would do his utmost to help. A few days later, he confirmed that Sneh would have an audience with the Vatican's secretary of state – Cardinal Domenico Tardini.

The meeting was scheduled for Oct. 3, 1947, and Nuncio Roncalli deliberately moved up a planned trip to Rome in order to be close at hand, just in case he would be needed.

While Cardinal Tardini did not make any promises, Sneh felt that he succeeded in conveying Israel's case. After the audience with Tardini, Sneh gathered with Abbé Glasberg and Nuncio Roncalli and reported his impressions of the meeting to them. Nuncio Roncalli was not satisfied. He had expected a firm commitment from Cardinal Tardini. He went even further by hinting that "Pope Pius XII might lose the opportunity of redeeming himself for his lack of action on behalf of the Jews during the Holocaust." Sneh's mission did turn out to be successful. To be sure, other factors contributed to this achievement, too, but one can assume that Sneh's meeting with Cardinal Tardini had a positive impact.

Twelve Latin American countries supported partition. Six abstained. Only Cuba voted against it.

In a single decade, this extraordinary man, Nuncio Roncalli, managed to help the Jewish people at two critical historical junctions: saving lives during the Holocaust and helping achieve the establishment of the State of Israel.

Israelis, Jews, people of all faiths who adhere to the most basic values of human dignity and freedom, owe this great hero a debt of eternal gratitude

Years before my conversation with Yair Tsaban, my good friend, the late Moshe Tov, one of the founding fathers of Israeli diplomacy, told me extensively about his endless meetings with officials and leaders from Latin American countries. In 1946, Tov had established the Latin American section of the Jewish Agency, and he played a decisive role in gaining the hearts and minds of most Latin American leaders. In my mind, Tov was one of the key players in helping influence the partition votes of the Latin American countries.

Another important player in this story, as previously mentioned, was Abbé Glasberg. He was posthumously recognized in January 2004 by Yad Vashem as Righteous among the Nations.

During the celebration of the 62nd anniversary of UN Resolution 181, Israeli President Shimon Peres received an important visitor to his home: his counterpart from Costa Rica, President Oscar Arias Sanchez. Like Peres, Sanchez is a Nobel Peace Prize laureate. Both are also members of the International Raoul Wallenberg Foundation, an NGO devoted to researching and divulging the legacies of the rescuers of victims of the Holocaust. Costa Rica has a rich democratic tradition, and it was one of the 12 Latin American countries that voted in favor of the Partition Plan and one of the first countries to recognize the newly created State of Israel.

A great many people played key roles behind the scenes of the vote on partition in 1947: the leaders of Latin American countries such as Costa Rica, noble, well-meaning people such as Nuncio Roncalli, Abbé Glasberg, Tov and Sneh.

It is our duty to remember them.

Baruch Tenembaum is the founder of the International Raoul Wallenberg Foundation.

After the punch, stick to the mission

Super Bowl XLIII is one of the greatest upsets ever, with the Giants defeating the seemingly invincible Patriots. After the game, Giants star Michael Strahan explained that his team won by exerting unrelenting pressure, which worked because "everybody has a plan, until they get punched in the face."

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

While this quote describes football and boxing, it's also an excellent description of life. Many people have brilliant futures until an unforeseen event derails their lives, and they're undone by an unexpected punch in the face. Families are shattered by divorce, careers ruined by bad luck, and lives disabled by illness. The punch in the face leaves many people down for the count.

For those accustomed to success, the bitter taste of failure is sometimes too hard to swallow. After major financial losses, German billionaire Adolf Merckle jumped in front of a train. After losing his client's money to Bernie Madoff, French banker Thierry Villehuchet took his own life. The embarrassment of defeat can be a knockout punch.

However, some people continue to fight on even after the battle seems lost.

This quixotic determination underpins all of Jewish history. Until 1948, Jewish history was the account of how the Jews moved on from one defeat to another. But why did we keep getting up off the canvas, just to be knocked down another time?

Joseph provides the answer. Joseph antagonizes his brothers with his presumptuous dreams, but one day, on a mission of peace, Joseph goes to the city of Shechem to greet his brothers. Instead of giving Joseph a chance, the brothers seize him and sell him into slavery. Afterward, Joseph struggles to rebuild his life.

Yet at the end of his life, the Midrash tells us, Joseph requests to be buried in Shechem, the very city he travelled to when he was sold into slavery.

Why did Joseph choose the location of his humiliating "punch in the face" as his final resting place?

The answer is simple: Joseph had a mission. He went to Shechem in the hope of reconciling with his brothers, and even though he was kidnapped, enslaved and exiled, he never let go of his mission. Joseph chooses a final resting place that reflects his loyalty to that mission.

"He who has a why to live for can bear almost any how." This quote from Nietzsche describes Joseph's return to Shechem and the Jewish People's return to Israel. It also reminds us that if you're on a mission, the game plan remains the same, both before and after the punch in the face.

Parliamentary hearings deserve praise

If the traditional definition of chutzpah has the murderer who kills his two parents pleading for leniency because he's an orphan, the modern anti-Semite's chutzpah is expressed by screeching about Israel obsessively, then being shocked when that obsession is noted, let alone criticized.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Today's new anti-Semites don't even have the courage of their convictions. They mask their traditional Jew-hatred behind a politically correct veneer of anti-racism, anti-apartheid, anti-occupation, we-are-the-world talk. But all their lovely liberal rhetoric can't hide the venom behind their disproportionate focus on Israel – and the harm they do to liberal ideas, as well as the Jewish state, with their hatred.

Predictably, the all-party Canadian Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Anti-Semitism (CPCCA) had barely convened its hearings when it was already being bashed. On the new website "The Mark," John Baglow complained that the "new parliamentary coalition against anti-Semitism is really about shutting down criticism of Israel" and that "the word 'anti-Semitism' has lost its original meaning almost entirely, and has become code for criticism of Israel and too-vocal support for the Palestinian people." Without listening to the hearings, Baglow and others instinctively caricatured this bipartisan initiative as a pro-Israel, anti-Palestinian witch-hunt.

I don't seek special treatment, only equal treatment. Would critics pounce so quickly on a parliamentary inquiry into racism, sexism or homophobia in Canada? And would anyone feel comfortable publicly suggesting that any of these scourges have disappeared "almost entirely?"

I wish Israel-bashing wasn't such a popular sport, on campus and off. I wish violence against Jews was trending down, not up. Alleging that human rights activists fighting Jew-hatred are McCarthyites squelching debate is absurd, considering how frequently Israel is criticized, both in Israel and abroad, by Jews and non-Jews. And I wish so much criticism of Israel wasn't intensified by historic anti-Semitic markers.

It's easy to differentiate between legitimate criticism of Israel and illegitimate criticism rooted in traditional Jew-hatred. For starters, anyone who suggests that critics of Israel have a hard time getting a hearing has overlooked what a boon Israel-bashing has been to the careers of Noam Chomsky, Norman Finkelstein, John Mearsheimer, Stephen Walt and now Naomi Klein. Especially for Jews, shrill anti-Israel invective is a fast-track to more media exposure, higher lecture fees and booming book sales.

More benignly, every day in synagogues around the world, as well as in Israeli newspapers and, these days, in the White House, Jews and non-Jews, presidents and regular folk, criticize Israeli actions without delegitimizing Israel – which is the clearest red-line to draw.

It doesn't make sense that Israel is singled out for disproportionate criticism, that Israel is the only UN member state whose existence is challenged, and that so much of the world's attention focuses on such a minor conflict. Describing the Israel-Palestinian national clash as a racial conflict or comparing Israel to South Africa – or, worse, to the Nazis – also doesn't make sense – unless, that is, you acknowledge the anti-Semitism that treats Israel, the Jewish state, as the Jew among nations, accused of disproportionate but secret power, or undue influence in squelching debate, and nefarious aims and methods in what is a complicated, tragic conflict, then tarred with accusations of "racism," "apartheid," and "genocide," when other countries whose actions truly fit those damning indictments escape notice.

Hopefully, the CPCCA hearings will help others draw the line more clearly, seeing where honest criticism ends and demonization, delegitimization and obsession begin.

But the hearings should also help us understand the historical pathology of anti-Semitism by highlighting the similarities between today's targeting of the Jewish state and the traditional targeting of the Jew. Yet we must learn from the modern mutation, too. The way the new anti-Semitism manifests itself, sometimes obscured by its "we're pro-Palestinian and we're just criticizing Israel" rhetoric, hides a despicable anti-democratic agenda. This upside-down agenda rationalizes terrorism, romanticizes violence, justifies extremism and perverts justice while purporting to defend it.

Exposing that charade isn't just important for Jews and the Jewish state, but for all of humanity, and especially western democracies such as Canada, which deserves applause for launching these important hearings.

Free Jerusalem!

There's nothing like a good old fashioned demonstration. I grew up in the 1960s, and we expected our Saturday nights to include some kind of strike, protest, rally or sit-in.

Israelis love a good demonstration, too. As generally emotive, opinionated, and strong-willed people, they take their feelings to the streets often, with passionate speeches, sentimental song-singing and a stirring "call-to-action" at the end. So my family and I happily took part in a quickly organized protest rally on the last Saturday night of November in Jerusalem. The rally was convened by a consortium of groups under the banner "Free Jerusalem" after the Nov. 18 arrest of Nofrat Frenkel, a 28-year-old Israeli medical student and committed Conservative Jew, for wearing a tallit on the women's side of the Western Wall.

Rabbi Elyce Goldstein in Jerusalem

The press treated the arrest as little more than a human interest story, but in Jerusalem it represented the straw that broke the camel's back after months of violent haredi protests against both a downtown public parking lot and an Intel factory being open on Shabbat. Those demonstrations included stone-throwing, rioting, fires being set, reporters being attacked, dirty diapers being dumped on police and vandalism.

In shuls and stores, on buses and in bars, people were talking about religious coercion and the right of each person to their own Jewish expression. Religious and secular Jews both started asking why they were being silent in the face of Frenkel's arrest and the growing fanaticism that's taking hold of formerly tolerant and pluralistic neighbourhoods.

The Jerusalem press reported that a few hundred "secular Jerusalemites" marched. In truth, it was close to 2,500 people of all ages, with many, many wearing kippot and tzitzit, skirts and hair-covering scarves. The Conservative and Reform movements were there in full form. And secular Jews? They were there, if by that you mean those who don't wear or live in black-and-white.

The speeches emphasized the willingness of protesters to dialogue with the haredim and their desire for a peaceful and united city, but their unwillingness to let Jerusalem devolve into a fundamentalist city with its own brand of morality police, run by those who don't recognize the rights of all citizens.

Speakers from the Knesset held kowtowing politicians responsible for placating and turning a blind eye to violent, disruptive, and even illegal haredi acts and the growing haredi coercion in all levels of local and national politics. Frenkel spoke eloquently of her simple desire to "serve the Creator in joy" as a woman. We sang Jerusalem of Gold and then, most powerfully, we were asked to sing Hatikvah – lihiyot am chofshi, to be a free people in our own land, in Eretz Yisrael and in Jerusalem – to reaffirm that our protest was a Zionist act of love for the Jewish State of Israel.

People openly wept, and I felt within the crowd a fierce dedication to both Israel and to its heart, Jerusalem. The Israeli who had marched next to me saying "I've had it, I'm moving to Tel Aviv" turned to me at the end and said, "Now I know I can't leave, but have to become active in the movement for a free Jerusalem. I want my Jerusalem back."

Throughout the rally, I kept thinking of all the Jews who have pretty much abandoned Judaism while sending money to haredim so "they will be Jewish for us." I kept thinking of the festival of Chanukah and its insistence on "dispelling the darkness" while experiencing the glow that exuded from Frenkel when she spoke about praying at the Wall.

In Jerusalem, a thriving new group is trying to rekindle the light by redefining who they will be in the years ahead. I wish them every success – for Jerusalem's sake.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Lakeland

Wilfred Wolfson, a spry 92, flipped through an album brimming with photographs and documents, pausing to reminisce. "This is a picture of my family when I was just a kid," he said. "This is my high school graduating degree." A widower since his wife's death last September after 63 years of marriage, he spent the next 15 minutes talking about himself and his family's place in Lakeland's history.

Sheldon Kirshner in Florida

Wolfson's late father, Cyrus, an immigrant from eastern Europe who set foot in America in 1899, was the first known Jewish person to settle in Lakeland, the biggest city in Polk county, which is named after the 11th president of the United States, James Knox Polk, who was sworn in a day after Florida, a former Spanish colony, was admitted into the union in 1845 as the 27th state.

Cyrus Wolfson, a worker in a New York City garment factory, arrived in Lakeland, in the heart of central Florida, exactly a century ago. "My dad's employer, a cloak and suit manufacturer, sent him to Ocala to check an account," he explained. "While there, he heard people talking about a railroad compound called Lake Land. Being adventurous, he took the train down. He liked the place and the people and decided that this would be a good place to settle down and grow."

In 1909, Lakeland, first settled by Europeans in the 1870s, was still a backwater, populated by just more than 3,000 hardy pioneers. Cyrus Wolfson returned in 1910 as a dry goods pedlar, married Freida Palestine in 1912, brought her to Lakeland and opened a clothing store shortly afterward. "They were the first Jewish people in Lakeland or Polk county," he said.

Twinned with the southern Ontario town of Richmond Hill, and the site of the Detroit Tigers' spring training camp since 1934, Lakeland is midway between Tampa and Orlando. It has a population of 90,000 today.

A pleasant town with tree-shaded neighbourhoods and dotted with small lakes, Lakeland is home to Florida Southern College, a private liberal arts institution whose campus contains the single largest collection of futuristic Frank Lloyd Wright buildings in the nation. Although Lakeland is probably a blank to most Canadians and Americans, it was the birthplace of the jazz legend Nat Adderley, the Hollywood actress-singer Frances Langford, the founder of the Publix supermarket empire George Jenkins, the Florida governor and senator Lawton Chiles, the television reporter and anchor Forrest Sawyer, the Miss America of 1953, Neva Jane Langley, and a Playboy playmate, Samantha Dorman.

Polk county, a centre of the citrus, cattle and phosphate industries and Florida's fourth largest county, is a prime tourist destination. Cypress Gardens, in Winter Haven, was Florida's inaugural theme park. Known for its lush gardens, water ski shows and strolling Southern belles, it has been closed for the past few months. Bok Tower Gardens, in Lakes Wales, has one of the world's great carillons and is listed on the National Register of Historic Places. Fantasy of Flight, in Polk City, is an aviation theme park with an unrivalled collection of vintage aircraft. Bartow, the county seat, is named after Francis Bartow, the first Confederate officer to be killed in the U.S. Civil War. With 554 lakes and a network of 133 parks and 42 campgrounds, Polk county also attracts outdoor enthusiasts and eco-tourists.

When Wilfred Wolfson came into this world, on Feb. 27, 1917, he was only the second known Jewish child to have been born in Lakeland. His late brother, Joshua Herbert, beat him out by a few years.

Until 1925, the Wolfsons were the sole Jewish family in Lakeland, but then came the Bursk, Blumberg, Moskovits, Racz and Wishnatzki families. (The Wishnatzki farms, managed by Gary Wishnatzki, yield berries and vegetables sold in Canada at Loblaw's and Costco under the Green Giant and Wishnatzki Farms brands, generating roughly $4 million in sales annually).

Wolfson, who graduated as a pharmacist from the University of Florida in 1940, opened Lakeland's first drive-in pharmacy, which multiplied into a chain of three shops and was eventually bought by Publix. "My dad was well respected and had a wonderful reputation. Lakeland was a great town to grow up in. We swam in the lakes every day of the year and camped out as Boy Scouts a lot."

When he was a young man, Lakeland, with a minority African-American community, was much like a Southern town and was strictly divided along racial, religious and class lines. "I did not feel out of place as a Jew," said Wolfson, who was a U.S. army lieutenant in the Pacific theatre during World War II. "I don't think there was any anti-Semitism, but I was called "Jew boy" sometimes. At that time, the blacks were segregated."

Wilfred Wolfson today

Catherine Eskin

Michael Wiener

Wolfson's parents were among the founders of Temple Emanuel, a Conservative synagogue and Lakeland's only shul, which marked its 75th anniversary this year. (The only other synagogue in Polk county, Temple Beth Shalom, a Reform congregation, is in Winter Haven.) Originally, services were conducted in rooms above a store and then in the basement of the American Legion building. In 1932, 16 families purchased a Seventh Day Adventist church and converted it into Temple Emanuel. In the early 1960s, Temple Emanuel moved into a modern white building on a grassy knoll in a fashionable neighbourhood overlooking Lake Hollingsworth.

According to Catherine Eskin, a professor of English at Florida Southern College and a member of Temple Emanuel's board of directors, several anti-Semitic members of the local zoning board tried to block the synagogue's application for relocation.

But when the outraged pastor of a Presbyterian church wrote a letter of complaint to the local daily newspaper, The Ledger, the zoning board finally gave way and Temple Emanuel was built. Yet even after this watershed victory, older members of the synagogue, preferring not to draw attention to the Jewish community, refused to erect a sign identifying Temple Emanuel, said Eskin, who has amassed an archive on Lakeland's Jewish presence. A sign was finally put up in 1998.

At around this point, Michael Wiener, a businessman from Montreal, settled in Lakeland. Since 2008, he has been the president of Temple Emanuel, while Cantor Victor Geigner of Buenos Aires has been its spiritual leader.

"Truthfully, I did not know Lakeland even existed or where it was," said Wiener, the proprietor of a rigging services company and legally a full-time resident of the United States. "I find it incredible that there have been Jews here since the early 20th century, considering the heat and the poor roads until well into the 1970s."

By his estimate, more than 225 families belonged to Temple Emanuel in the decades following World War II. "We presently have approximately 110 member families. The Jewish community is very well respected and integrated. There is little or no apparent anti-Semitism." To Wiener, the quality of life in Lakeland is very good. "Very little traffic. Excellent golf, fishing and water sports." But, as he pointed out, there are no kosher butchers, restaurants or food stores here. "There are in Tampa and the surrounding area. The Publix store in Lakeland has a kosher section and a wide selection of Passover foods."

Eskin, a Philadelphian who has lived in Lakeland since 1999, ascribes the decline of Temple Emanuel's membership to changing times. In her view, the synagogue lost its primacy in the lives of its members when anti-Semitism fizzled as an openly respectable phenomenon and Jews were permitted to join clubs that once were off-limits to them.

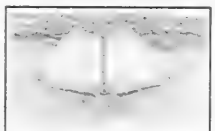
Pluralistic lessons at Chanukah

By RABBI ADAM CUTLER



In December 2005, a year and a half into my five years of rabbinical school, I spoke at the Festivals of Light celebration at Shaare Zion Congregation in Montreal. Leaders from various religious and ethnic groups presented on their own festival of light. I was shocked, humbled and humoured in equal measure when I discovered on the afternoon's program that each speaker was listed together with his or her institutional affiliation.

Father John Walsh, the leading Anglophone Catholic priest in Quebec, was listed alongside Saint John Brebeuf Parish, while Rev. Darryl Gray was listed beside the massive Imani Full Gospel Church. Also listed were a guru, a pastor and the convening rabbi. Beside my name, the program stated "Jewish Theological Seminary." In the minds of most attendees, by dint of program design, I was promoted from student to professor.

Chanukah behooves us to re-examine our relationship with the non-Jewish community and challenges the individual to ask of himself, "What do I stand for and who do I represent?"

In the view of Jewish historians, we may see the Maccabean revolt as a true political civil war between competing social climbers, economic classes and ethnic groups, as does Victor Tcherikover, or, according to Elias Bickerman's proposal, as a religious and cultural battle between Hellenistic and Jewish values instigated by Jews who changed temple practice. While the formula of the strong versus the weak and the many versus the few expressed in the Al Hanissim prayer holds strong to our hearts and minds, we know that the second-century Maccabean revolt was considerably more complex.

Jews with different ideas and ideologies, varying desires and destinations took to the battlefield one against the other. Some were open to learning from their non-Jewish neighbours, while others found meaning solely within their Jewish heritage. Every Jew had to decide what she personally stood for, as the community could not collectively represent itself to the ruling authority.

Certainly, today we are happy for the war. We gained a holiday, complete with beautiful candlelighting, miracles, children's games and lots of delicious oily food. As we are reminded by the end of the Joseph narrative, which we begin reading anew this week, even bad actions can lead to good conclusions. It's nice when all works out for the best, but there is never any assurance that it will.

After all the fighting and the miracle of the oil, after the temple was cleaned up and the dead buried, on the ninth day, the victors and the vanquished – Jews on both sides – had to sit down and learn to live together. Ultimately, the civilization that developed incorporated aspects of both groups, and we, their descendants, are better off for it.

As a Jewish community, we have pockets of strength, but our internal struggles tear at our unity. I believe in a niche marketing model for the Jewish people – a civilization of programs encompassing all aspects of the human experience, from the ritual to cultural, from learning to eating.

In order to keep Jews interested and for our own survival, we need various ways of being Jewish. That's not to say that I am uncommitted to my particularistic version of Judaism. Rather, it's clear to me that the likelihood that I am the sole custodian of God's desires for the Jewish people is fairly low. We've always had and always will have competing Jewish groups and interests. We must not, however, let those differences separate us to the point of conflict, whether fought on the battlefield, in the press or through complete communal separation. The battles of Chanukah were deadly, but they ultimately brought us joy. The next one may not turn out as well.

During that celebration in Montreal, I learned about the many festivals of light. Indeed, light is a universal symbol. The stories and teachings shared only enhanced my appreciation of our holiday. As for my sudden move from student to professor, it ultimately helped me clarify what I stand for and whom I represent.

No women, no Chanukah

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

There's a very strong connection between women and Chanukah. Everyone is familiar with the story of the Maccabees and the great revolt in which many were handed over to the few and the Jewish victory resulted in the rededication of the Temple in Jerusalem.

Most people are equally familiar with the little jar of unspoiled oil still bearing the seal of the High Priest that was found and used to kindle the menorah in the Temple. Whether each family actually spins a dreidel and bets on the results or only tapes the dreidel to the chocolate money coins doesn't matter. What's important is that dreidels are present and chocolate coins are shared.

We recite praises to God and detail the heroes of Israel as we sing songs in rounds. Candles are lit and latkes fill the air with the smell of oil. Yet the connection of women to this holiday, in particular, usually goes unnoticed.

In Jewish law, women aren't obligated to fulfil positive commandments that are triggered by time. In other words, if the sun or the season speaks to when the commandment should be fulfilled, women are exempt. Lighting the Chanukah candles is clearly a positive commandment triggered by time. The candles must be lit in the evening before the sun has set and must continue to burn for at least a half an hour. This would most definitely be one of those mitzvot that women would be exempt from fulfilling.

Yet the Talmud is clear that lighting Chanukah candles is incumbent on women as well as men. These candles represent an exception to the general rule, because, according to the rabbis, women were intrinsic to the holiday. In other words, if not for the women – no Chanukah.

Jewish communities, by and large, don't study the books of the Maccabees. If they did, they would find within those pages stories of countless women who gave up their lives to secure Jewish law and ideals within the cities and towns. While the men fought the physical battle, the women fought the spiritual battle. The men's victory would be pointless if the women had lost. Reclaiming a Temple with no Judaism to fill it isn't the goal.

If we read further in the books of the Maccabees, we would come across the story of Hannah and her seven sons, but I don't recommend this reading to anyone who isn't prepared to read the details of prolonged torture carried out on children in front of their mother.

Hannah's strength, focus and commitment is nothing short of a miracle in itself and should bring her into the legends of Jewish warrior heroes. She is the personal story of ancient women who circumcised their infant sons and reinforced Jewish values never to sink to the barbaric level of an enemy.

There is a Jewish law that states that women must light Chanukah candles, and with it is a Jewish law that states that all Jewish women must refrain from doing any work while the candles burn. It's the Jewish way of saying thank you to Jewish women for the foundation they bring to every generation. Surely the dreidel can wait while the candles burn and the women are honoured.

Chariot vase discovered at Tel Dan

Tel Dan has been described as the northernmost part of Israel, which the Bible says extends "from Dan to Be'er Sheva." It's also the most northerly major archeological site in Israel and is located in the Upper Galilee.

Past Forward

The American Orientalist, Edward Robinson, initially identified the site in 1838. It is an identification that is now universally accepted, especially since a bilingual Greek/Aramaic inscription was found on the site in 1976 mentioning the "god of Dan." (It would not be the only important inscription that was found there.)

The site has a history going back more than 7,000 years to the middle of the Neolithic period, circa 5000 BCE. Its location near the headwaters of the Jordan ensured that it would have a plentiful supply of water without which habitation wouldn't be possible. Its strategic placement at the northern entrance to the Galilee, at the base of Mount Hermon, attest to its geopolitical importance.

The excavation of the site began in 1966 as a "temporary rescue operation" and have been going on ever since. They were directed by the legendary, cigar-smoking, Avraham Biran, who was a giant of Israeli archeology. He produced some amazing discoveries

Among them is a perfectly preserved magnificent gate that dates to the high point of the Middle Bronze Age, circa 1800 BCE, the golden age of Canaanite civilization. The gate is seven metres high. Other spectacular finds turned up at Tel Dan, as well.

One of the first important discoveries was found by the excavators in 1969. It was a tomb with some amazing examples of Mycenaean pottery dating to the Late Bronze Age, circa 1300 BCE, the most spectacular of which is an almost perfectly preserved krater, or large pot, depicting a chariot and its driver. Chemical tests that were performed on the vase show that it had been made in southern Greece.

The Myceneans themselves have been equated with the Homeric host at Troy, thanks in part to the spectacular decipherment of their script, Linear B, in 1952. This was accomplished by Michael Ventris, an English architect and an amateur scholar. It was an amazing feat and ranks as one of the great scholarly breakthroughs of the 20th century.

The discovery of the chariot vase at Tel Dan shows how far flung the Mycenaean trading ventures were. It also confirms the truth of the statement, by James Henry Breasted, the founder of the famous Oriental Institute at the University of Chicago, that this period in history was the first international age.

An even more spectacular discovery would occur at Tel Dan in 1993-94, when fragments of a stela, or inscription, were accidentally found. Unfortunately, it was not found in a proper context, but its contents would set off a scholarly firestorm.

The inscription has been attributed to the Aramean kingdom of Damascus and probably dates to the ninth century BCE. In it, for the first time, we have the name of "David" mentioned outside of the Bible. More specifically though, it refers to the "House of David" and not the ruler.

Its discovery came at exactly the time when some scholars, who have been labelled as "minimalists," cast doubt on many of the events and individuals portrayed in the Bible.

Some minimalists, such as Philip Davies of Sheffield University, doubted that David even existed. He once told me that the stela only mentioned the royal house and not the individual. In the end, however, it has been conceded that the Tel Dan stela showed, more than likely, that David had existed, even though it may not have fully silenced the critics.

Yet like any major discovery, it can't verify or negate peoples' faith. Faith by its very definition defies proof.

Music sites for Chanukah

Chanukah is almost here, and that means so are a whole slew of traditional holiday songs. For those of you who'd like to brush up on the classics while learning a few that will have bubbe doing a double take, I now present eight (or so) music sites for eight Chanukah nights.

Night No. 1: Start with what must be the largest collection of free Chanukah music on the web. IsraelNationalNews.com's Jukebox has well over 10 hours of holiday tunes, with everything from the familiar to the obscure. Go to this link, [bit.ly/chanuk13], click on Holiday Songs and scroll down for the Chanukah songs (and Rosh Hashanah, Tu b'Shvat, Purim, Passover, etc.).

Night No. 2: The Jewish National & University Library in Jerusalem has put together a marvellous website that preserves the sounds and songs of Jewish communities from around the world. There are five versions for the menorah candlelighting ceremony (Ashkenazi, Carlebach-style, Hungarian, Algerian and Sephardi) with other Chanukah songs from Algeria, France, Turkey and Italy, and the lovely Ir Kleyne Likhtelekh (Oh, You Little Candles) in Yiddish. [bit.ly/chanuk1] All files are available in MP3 format, which can be downloaded and played on an iPod.

Night No. 3: Tonight it's time for something different. Reggae Chanukah mixes Caribbean rhythms, traditional Ghanaian dance drumming and Middle Eastern instruments "to batteries of Brazilian and Latin percussion, as samba meets mambo for some salsa on their latkes." Although many of the songs are new, you'll recognize familiar melodies peeking through the reggae Maoz Tzur and Chanukah, Skanukah. You can preview excerpts from the entire album online. [bit.ly/ chanuk3] and listen to three longer cuts here. [bit.ly/ chanuk4]

Night No. 4: It wouldn't be Chanukah without Adam Sandler's modern classic The Chanukah Song, in which he reminds the world about prominent Jews in movies, music and sports. In the process, he devises some interesting rhymes for the word Chanukah: "Put on that yarmulke /It's time for Chanukah / Two-time Oscar winner/ Dustin Hoffmonica /Celebrates Chanukah." [bit.ly/chanuk6] Sandler's written a couple of sequels with lyrics that aren't always as gentle as I Have a Little Dreidel.

Night No. 5: One of the most famous songs associated with the holiday is Handel's Judas Maccabeus. The oratorio celebrates the victories of the ancient Jewish loyalists against their pagan foes. Eliezer Segal examines how one of Handel's themes, "See the Conquering Hero Comes," has been adopted by Jews as a Chanukah melody. According to Segal, the irony is that when Handel composed Judas Maccabeus, he was more concerned that it become a "pageant of English patriotism rather than a source of Jewish national pride." The tune will play as you enter the website. [bit.ly/chanuk7]

Night No. 6: A few years ago, the gifted wordsmith Tom Lehrer composed another seasonal favourite. "I'm spending Chanukah in Santa Monica /Wearing sandals, lighting candles by the sea." Now someone has added amusing photos and posted a not-to-be-missed video on YouTube. [bit.ly/chanuk8] For an encore, enjoy a suave rendition by Brandeis University's group, Jewish Fella A Cappella. [bit.ly/chanuk9]

Night No. 7: They're classics in Israel, and they can be in your home, too. If you can read Hebrew, I think you'll appreciate the Chagim website. You'll find the lyrics to more than 27 Hebrew Chanukah songs, including Ner Li (I Have a Flame), Levivot (Latkes) and Nes Chanukah (Miracle of Chanukah). [bit.ly/chanuk10]

Night No. 8: Everybody's favourite little dreidel is, of course, made of clay. But if you want a new dreidel to sing about, look no further than the Hava Nashira Jewish Songleader's Resource. [bit.ly/chanuk11] Following are some modern variations of the classic.

• I have a little dreidel, I made it out of glue/ The baby tried to spin it, and now she's spinning, too.

• I have a little dreidel made from a CD-ROM/ It helped me launch a startup called DreidelSpin-dot-com!

• I had a little dreidel, I made it out of clay/ Said a kabbalistic blessing and it got up and walked away

Ve'ahavta donates more than 1,000 school supply kits

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

To some children, taking notes in class is an annoyance. To others, it's a luxury.

"We know there are over 850,000 orphans in Zimbabwe who go to school today without proper school supplies," said Kirill Zaretsky, the director of development for Ve'ahavta, a Jewish humanitarian and relief organization based in Canada.

Ve'ahavta volunteers Mikki Noble-Gresty and Bunny Vyner (right), pack school supplies to be shipped to Zimbabwe under the organization's Kinder Kits program.

"To buy school supplies, to record information, to write down a new idea or a thought is key."

To enable some children to do these things, Ve'ahavta developed Kinder Kits, a new initiative that sends a kit filled with school supplies to needy students in Canada and worldwide.

"What we realized as the economy slipped was that more children were being affected by the downturn, and [fewer] parents were able to do basic things [like buying] school supplies," Zaretsky said, adding that the program started six months ago.

Ve'ahavta's goal is to send out a total of 25,000 to 50,000 kits by March 2010 to countries including Canada, Israel, Zimbabwe and Kenya, where there is a need and a means of distributing supplies.

So far, some 1,600 kits have been shipped to students in Zimbabwe, about 100 were sent to Montreal and around 150 were distributed in Toronto.

The kits, which cost about $18 each, include supplies like binders, rulers, pencils, paper and backpacks.

"Organizations out there talk about [African schools] having a single pencil for 30 kids. That's a reality. We want to change this reality," Zaretsky said.

Ve'ahavta volunteers pack supplies for children in Zimbabwe.

Ecojot, an environmentally friendly paper products company, is working to help Zaretsky reach his goal.

The company has donated 4,000 to 5,000 school supplies to the initiative so far, and plans to donate 20,000 to 25,000 by spring of 2010.

"Everyone I've spoken to thinks it's an amazing thing... I'm very encouraged by that," said Mark Gavin, Ecojot's co-owner. "It brings a deeper purpose to our business... we'll actually make a small difference in the world. Maybe even a large one."

In January 2010, Gavin's company will launch a new program called Buy One, We'll Donate One, where they'll donate certain supplies based on how many of those supplies are purchased. This means that for every notebook they sell, they'll donate one to initiatives like Kinder Kits.

"There's a need... In poor countries, even if [students] go to school, they don't actually get stuff. Our kids are given paper and crayons and supplies," he said.

But that's not always the case, said Bunny Vyner, a retired middle school teacher and Ve'ahavta volunteer. While teaching in Toronto, Vyner has seen children come to school hungry and without the proper supplies.

"Here in North America... we aren't aware of this," she said. "You have kids who have and kids who don't next to each other. I think having a pen or a notebook or an eraser is kind of an inspiration in itself."

Vyner, who helps organize Kinder Kit shipments and is spearheading used backpack drives, sees the program as a necessity.

"It's about providing impoverished kids with the means to learn. Education helps lead people out of the cycle of poverty," she said.

To volunteer with Ve'ahavta or donate school supplies, visit veahavta.org or call 416-964-7698.

School acts as 'bridge' for Israeli community

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Kachol Lavan, the Centre for Hebrew and Israeli Studies, began in a Thornhill basement just half a dozen years ago.

It is now housed at Leo Baeck Day School's Thornhill campus and has grown to serve more than 200 students from junior kindergarten through Grade 8. The school is offering – or will offer – several new programs this year, in addition to its regular Sunday classes.

Among them are adult Hebrew classes and a choir for adults (in addition to its children's choir), as well as science and arts programs for children.

Dorit Oren, the school's administrator, opened her home for the fledgling school – then called Studio Sabras – about a year after moving here from Israel. At the time, her daughter was nine years old, and her son was three.

Kachol Lavan administrator Dorit Oren, left, and school principal Ariel Zaltzman says the school has "Israeli spirit." [Frances Kraft photo]

A friend of hers – art teacher Orly Breitner, also a new immigrant – suggested that they start a home-based program for children to learn Hebrew and Jewish holiday-related material through art.

They started with about 15 children in Oren's basement. Oren, who has a business background, said the school's popularity grew, and "all of a sudden we were a big group."

They wrote to Cobie Brosh, then Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, to request help opening a Sunday school or supplementary program for Israeli immigrants.

"We wanted to keep the Israeli identity, not just the Judaism," said Oren.

Within a few weeks, they were put in touch with a representative of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. The school now operates as a joint initiative of the federation, its Schwartz/Reisman Centre, and the Israeli Forum.

Kachol Lavan's principal, Ariel Zaltzman – the father of two teenage girls – has been in Toronto for two years, following a three-year stint in Hamilton, Ont., where he was principal of the Kehila Jewish Community Day School, and three years prior to that in Youngstown, Ohio, as a shaliach at a Jewish school there. When he joined Kachol Lavan, the school had two branches. Zaltzman started at the southern location, Bialik Hebrew Day School. The locations have since been consolidated, and students in the southern part of the city are now bused to Leo Baeck.

Although Kachol Lavan started in response to the needs of Israeli immigrants, it now has a total of 35 non-Israeli students in three classes geared to their needs.

As well, some families intend to make aliyah, and the school offers an Israeli environment that helps prepare the children, Oren said.

"We emphasize the connection the community here has to the State of Israel, said Zaltzman.

"We don't want our kids to lose their roots," added Oren.

The school, which uses Israeli texts and adapted language programs that are used in Israel, also serves as a bridge for some students before they go to Jewish day school, Zaltzman said. It offers a Grade 6 bar/bat mitzvah program and a Holocaust education program for Grade 7 and 8 students.

Grade 8 was added this year, and the school has started working with the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto to pave the way for Kachol Lavan graduates to enter the Jewish community high school.

Likewise, TanenbaumCHAT has tried to reach out to the Israeli community over the past two to three years, its director of education, Paul Shaviv, told The CJN.

Zaltzman said, "We feel [Kachol Lavan is] kind of a bridge for Israelis to engage more with the community here."

Attendance at Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit higher than expected

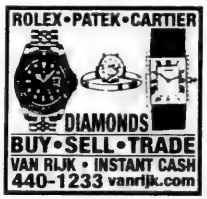
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Though the Israel Antiquities Authority Friends of Canada paid tribute to him at a gala dinner last week, William Thorsell, the outgoing director of the Royal Ontario Museum, did not regard the plaudits as a personal honour

"They were honouring the success of the exhibit," said Thorsell in a reference to the Dead Sea Scrolls exhibition, which ends its six-month run at the ROM on Jan. 3, 2010

"It was one of the most successful exhibits in our history," he said in an interview several days before the dinner, which took place at the ROM. "There is clearly an audience out there for serious and compelling exhibits. We don't have to dumb down."

As of last week, he noted, 250,000 visitors had passed through the exhibition. "It's a very high number for a special exhibit and higher than our expectations," he said. "We're running 60,000 to 70,000 ahead of our projections."



He added that a further 50,000 visitors may yet visit before it closes.

Yaen Vered, the Canadian representative of the Israel Antiquities Authority, described the exhibit as "a great success," saying it highlighted a different facet of Israel and underscored Israel's role as a "keeper of cultural and human values."

Pointing out that an accompanying series of lectures on the scrolls also had been popular, Vered said he received about 30 appreciative letters from Grade 11 students, most of them Muslims, who expressed gratitude for having been exposed to a dimension of history with which they had been unfamiliar.

Thorsell, the former editor-in-chief of the Globe and Mail, first laid eyes on the Dead Sea Scrolls at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, long before they were exhibited in Toronto.

As he gazed on the scrolls, he thought they would be of immense interest to Torontonians. "They are important to Judaism, Christianity and Islam. They are the shared roots of a number of traditions."

Yet strictly speaking, Thorsell was not the catalyst for bringing them to Canada.

After having seen the scrolls in Israel, a local high school teacher and a CJN columnist, Alex Gropper, approached a ROM curator and suggested that an exhibit would go over well with the public.

"I thought it was a fantastic proposal," said Thorsell.

He admits he was surprised by a local Palestinian boycott of the exhibit. Palestinians claimed that the scrolls were looted by Israel from the Palestine Archeological Museum and were thus Palestinian property.

"It was the first time this issue was raised," said Thorsell. "They made their point and we carried on."

In his view, the matter can only be resolved through negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians.

William Thorsell, outgoing director of the Royal Ontario Museum

Money raised at last week's dinner will be used to fund the Tel Yoqne'am Educational Archeological Park, near the Jezreel Valley and Mount Carmel, as well as the William Thorsell Endowment Fund in Education.

The site, mentioned in the Book of Joshua three times and the venue of an Early Bronze Age settlement almost 5,000 years ago, will be maintained by the Israel Antiquities Authority in collaboration with local schools, and will be used by the residents of Yoqne'am for study and recreational purposes.

"It'll be a living archeological site," said Thorsell, adding that ROM archeologists will continue to work in the area.

ROM archeologists are also carrying out excavations in Syria, Jordan, Egypt and Armenia, he pointed out.

The endowment fund will provide financial aid and support for Canadian students who wish to pursue a career in archeology.

"It's wonderful to be helping students develop their skills as they begin their careers," he said.

Thorsell will step down as ROM's director next August after a decade in office.

"I don't know what I'll do, but I won't retire."

2 STOCK DONATIONS

made simple at www.ujastocks.com

With no capital gains tax on publicly traded securities donated to a public charity, the time has never been better to transfer your stocks to UJA.

The normal taxable portion of the capital gain when securities are sold is 50%.

A receipt is issued based on the market value of the transferred securities on the day UJA receives them in our account. However, the amount credited to your campaign pledge will be based on the proceeds realized from the sale of the securities, less selling commission.

3 HOTLINE

Call the UJA Payment Hotline at 416.631.5705 and a member of our staff will process your payment immediately.

4 INTERNET / TELEPHONE BANKING

For your convenience, you can pay your UJA pledge through internet or telephone banking at the following financial institutions: Bank of Montreal, CIBC, Scotiabank, RBC and TD Canada Trust.

Internet Banking made easy:

- You will need to add UJA to your list of payees where we are listed as "United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto".
- You will need to input the first six digits of your UJA account prior to the letter 'A'. Your UJA account can be found in the upper right corner of your UJA billing statement.

Pledge payments must be made prior to December 31st to receive a 2009 tax receipt.

Master's degree aimed at Jewish professionals

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Sixteen young professionals who work in the Canadian Jewish community were in Chicago recently for an intensive week of study as part of a new master of arts program created specifically for them.

The Canadian MAJPS (Master of Arts in Jewish Professional Studies) is a partnership of UIA Canada and Chicago's Spertus College (part of the Spertus Institute of Jewish Studies).

Tuition is subsidized by UIAFC and local federations. As well, the Icenter – a new, Chicago-based endeavour dealing with Israel education – has offered fellowships to seven students focusing on that area.

Students – who range in age from mid-20s to mid-30s and are based in Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, London, Guelph and Israel – must commit to working in the community for the two-year program and for two years after it ends.

The week in Chicago was the first of two "intensives" being held every year in Chicago, Montreal or Toronto to supplement online or video conferences and individual learning.

"Our hope is that through this program we will secure a very powerful group of young professionals that will be the future leaders of this community," said Michael Soberman, national director, Canada Israel Experience, who was instrumental in getting the program off the ground.

In 2008, UIA Federations Canada, in partnership with local federations, began to look at how to attract and retain young professionals to the field of Jewish communal service, Soberman told The CJN.

Their first initiative was a professional development mission to Cuba. While there, Soberman floated the idea of an academic path that people could pursue while continuing to work. The response was "overwhelmingly positive," he said.

The new program was the result. It is based on an existing program that has run for two years under the direction of Jewish education professor Barry Chazan, with two cohorts from the Chicago area.

"The MAJPS is an educational initiative that has the possibility of transforming our professional environment by attracting and retaining young talent who see their future as Jewish community professionals," said Linda Kislowicz, UIAFC's chief executive officer.

Shauna Waltman – a 29-year-old graduate of the University of Western Ontario's Richard Ivey School of Business, who works with Soberman as alumni and outreach manager for Canada Israel Experience – told The CJN that she's always wanted to go back to school, but didn't want to take time off from work.

Although she attended Jewish camps and Jewish day school and was involved with Hillel at university, Waltman didn't consider a career in the Jewish community until she went on a Birthright Israel trip following graduation.

"I always compare it to the boy next door," she said. "I really do think finding the ideal career is like finding your mate."

She said the new program puts a career in the Jewish community on the map and gives it legitimacy.

Sarah Atkins, 31, the director of March of the Living in Montreal, left her career as a high school teacher after a chance conversation with someone who works in the Jewish community.

A native of North Bay who studied at McMaster University and Nipissing University, Atkins said she thought the new program would be "a good marriage between Jewish learning and [the] professional side.

"I really do feel I'll be able to grow, both personally and professionally."

Greater Toronto Area

Student Avi Charney is presented with a Young Leadership Award by Rabbi Shmuli and Chani Nachlas of Chabad Youth Network.

Gala honours students for volunteerism

Compiled by CJN Staff

The students honoured at the inaugural benefit gala of Chabad Youth Network of Ontario agreed that their positive experiences with the group will remain with them as they plan their future.

Some 300 people, including prominent dignitaries, rabbis, supporters and friends, recently gathered at the Terrace Banquet Hall in Vaughan to show support for the work of Chabad Youth Network (CYN) and to pay tribute to the evening's Young Leadership Honorees.

CYN is a pioneer charitable organization geared to Jewish youth across the GTA. Its purpose is to give Jewish teens a strong sense of identity, offer them an opportunity to reconnect with the traditions of their heritage, and empower them with a greater sense of morality, benevolence and responsibility to their respective communities by means of Jewish education combined with pro-active community involvement.

Some 250-plus unaffiliated teenagers come through the doors of CYN's drop-in centre in Thornhill, Ont., for classes, social activities, or just to hang out and engage the rabbi in lively discussions on critical teen issues. CYN strives to provide these teens with the tools, both emotionally and intellectually, to become the leaders of tomorrow.

As they entered the gala, guests exchanged greetings at wine-tasting stations, sampled from the gourmet cocktail and vegetable display or viewed the artwork, sports memorabilia and jewelry on display at the Bid for the Kids silent auction.

When CYN director Rabbi Shmuli Nachlas was called to the podium to speak, the crowd rose to their feet with resounding applause in acknowledgment of the work Rabbi Shmuli, as he is affectionately known, has done for teens in the GTA.

During dinner, guests were shown a video of the CYN initiatives, and paid tribute to the three Young Leadership Honorees, Mallory Starkman, Daniel Goldhar and Avi Charney, who were recognized for their volunteerism.

They all spoke about their involvement with CYN and their affection for Rabbi Nachlas and his wife, Chani.

"The reason for the success of the programs run through Chabad Youth Network is because of the positive atmosphere," said Starkman, a senior at Westmount Collegiate Institute. "Regardless of religious observance levels, Rabbi Shmuli has always been open to newcomers looking to get involved with any program. Never does Rabbi Shmuli preach at us, but instead stresses the point that the Torah is liberating, not limiting.

"Chani also deserves much credit," he continued. "Chani has been nothing but warm, kind and hospitable. The Nachlas are easy to relate to, and as a result, kids and teens have responded well, leading them to make lifestyle choices that impact their lives in a positive way."

Charney, a second-year law student, quoted Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, the chief rabbi of the United Kingdom, who once said, "'Good leaders create followers but great leaders create leaders.' From what I have seen," Charney said, "the leaders of tomorrow are being created in the programs being run by CYN today."

Goldhar, a marketing student at York University, said, "Chabad Youth Network re-ignites a sense of communal responsibility for our Jewish youth and reveals a form of Yiddishkeit that embraces our Jewish heritage and values. More importantly, all the activities and programs that reach out to bring young Jews back to our heritage are done in a spirit of fun, equality and affection – everyone is welcome, the camaraderie is warm and the atmosphere is inviting."

While the first gala event for CYN surpassed all expectations, Rabbi Shmuli said, the greatest satisfaction will be experienced by the teens who benefit from the classes and programs that Chabad Youth Network provides. CYN is unaffiliated with any synagogue or particular community. For more information on programs, please call CYN at 905-889-7582 or e-mail info@jewishyouth.ca

The final session of the Ottawa group, sponsored by Jewish Family Services and held at its offices, took place Nov. 26.

The course co-ordinator, former Russian Nachum Vais, explained how the final evening would unfold. "Today is the last session, the final matchmaking for participants and organizations. We have three people matched up already, and we hope to match the remaining participants today."

Olga Chechelnitsky has been in Canada for 31 years and in Ottawa for more than five, yet she hasn't been involved in the Jewish community at all.

"I was brought up completely assimilated and know practically nothing about being Jewish," she said. "I feel Jewish but I don't observe any Jewish holidays, do not eat kosher and don't go to synagogue. However, I do want to be part of the Jewish community.

"Russian Jews are probably different because of the way they were brought up. We were brought up like Russians."

The high-tech manager is nearing retirement age and thinking about how to spend her leisure time. She has management and organizational skills that she would like to share. "If I want to help, I would prefer to help the Jewish community," she said.

The curriculum was designed to introduce the Russians to Jewish life in Canada through a variety of "layers," including a reading list of books dealing with the Russian immigrant experience; shadowing a mentor in one of the organizations; discussions among themselves and with organizational representatives, and, finally, internships within various organizations.

For the final Ottawa session, national project co-ordinator Ronda Stoller Wunsch, who is based in Toronto, and Neta Golshtein, an emissary from the Jewish Agency of Israel to the Russian-speaking Jewish community in Toronto, were in attendance.

The pilot project was funded nationally by Genesis Philanthropy Group (GPG – North America), with each pilot site raising matching funds.

Mila Voihanski, executive director of JIAS Canada, said her agency is considering expanding the program into other communities.

Correction

In the Nov. 26 story "Federation must focus on youth," incorrectly reported that UJA Federation of Greater Toronto lost more than $18 million on its investments last year, although $12 million has been recouped in the first quarter of the new year. In fact, it was the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, not federation, that lost money and then recouped part of the loss. The CJN apologizes for the error.

In addition, the story said that in 2008-2009, about $82 million was raised through the annual UJA campaign. Updated information provided to us after we went to press noted that that the total amount raised for campaign, capital and endowments in the fiscal year 2008-2009 was $87 million.

Program aimed at young Canadians

Both in the classroom and in her current work, Atkins said her motivation has been "to make a positive difference in the world."

As a result of her studies in Chicago, she has already "tweaked a few things" in the curriculum she is co-authoring for March of the Living.

Jeff Bradshaw, senior director of planning for the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, has spent the past half dozen years working for the Jewish community. The director of programming at the Vancouver Hillel Foundation before he moved to Ottawa last year, Bradshaw worked for Canadian Jewish Congress as a student at Simon Fraser University and became "enamoured" with the work.

A Toronto native, Bradshaw, 30, has a background in theatre and political science. Through the Spertus program, he hopes to raise his Jewish literacy as well as further his professional skills.

"The scope and breadth of my work [in the Jewish community] is amazing and humbling," he said. "Jewish communal service has great advantages – working with committed lay leaders, and having some impact on the community in the long run. It's about rolling up your sleeves and being part of the solution."

Q & A with Natan Sharansky, Chair, Jewish Agency

"To be strong as Jews, we must have strong identities"

Edited Interview by Daniel Horowitz

Natan Sharansky is a human rights activist who served as the symbol of the movement to free Soviet Jewry under Communist Soviet rule, and today is Chairman of the Executive of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI). He comes uniquely qualified to his position at JAFI, the world's largest Jewish nonprofit, which partners world Jewry – including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto – with the people of Israel. Born in Donetzk, Ukraine in 1948, Mr. Sharansky became active in the human rights movement in the Soviet Union. In an effort to curtail his activities, a Soviet court sentenced Mr. Sharansky to thirteen years in prison, including solitary confinement and hard labour. After nine years of imprisonment, and following intense international pressure, Mr. Sharansky was released from prison in February 1986 – and arrived in Jerusalem on the same day. In Israel, Mr. Sharansky became active in the integration of Soviet Jews in Israeli society and founded a political party for immigrants, through which he was elected to the Knesset. From 1996 to 2005 he served as Minister, as well as Deputy Minister, in successive governments. Mr. Sharansky was awarded the US Congressional Gold Medal in 1986 and the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 2006. During his recent visit to Toronto to address UJA donors, he spoke to UJA's Editorial Director, Dan Horowitz.

Q You have a long and important relationship with Toronto. Can you explain?

A When I lived in the Soviet Union, I knew that early in the 20th century some of our relatives left for the United States and Canada. After my arrest, and when my wife Avital went around the world to draw attention to my case, our relatives in Toronto decided that we must be cousins and suddenly I had 20 more relatives who started fighting for me, as a family, and who eventually connected me with Irwin Cotler who later became my lawyer. In fact, the first citizenship I received was Canadian.

Q What are your thoughts on Toronto's Jewish community today?

A Toronto's Jewish community is one of the strongest, most pro-Zionist Diaspora communities with a very high level of Jewish education; with outreach programs to different parts of the community. It's not surprising to me that it is one of the very few Jewish communities in the free world that continues to grow today.

Toronto is a very good partner of the Jewish Agency for Israel in understanding that we have a mutual struggle. When you are running an organization like JAFI, it's important to support different projects around the world, but also our core values.

There has to be a trust between the Jewish Agency's efforts and the efforts of the Federations and this trust exists between Toronto and JAFI, and they contribute greatly to our mutual cause of rescuing Jews, educating Jews, and building on Jewish identity.

Q Your struggle ignited a unique bond with Jews around the world. It was a special time for world Jewry. How can we reignite that type of bond today?

A We need to respond to a different emergency today, to defend and protect our Jewish identity. We need to reach deep into our Jewish identity in view of the attacks to delegitimize us, Israel and to weaken Jews' connection to Israel and to each other. As a result of these ongoing attacks, assimilation is eating Jewish communities, and for Israel, it is more and more difficult for it to defend the very idea of the legitimacy of the Jewish state. That is the problem we have to deal with immediately. We have to energize and mobilize all the Jewish communities around the world, and to work together with the Israeli government. The Jewish Agency is uniquely positioned to be the bridge between Jews around the world and the State of Israel."

Q What, in your opinion, is JAFI's key role today?

A JAFI accomplished great things in the past by bringing more than 3 million Jews to what is now Israel. JAFI also did a great job in mobilizing world Jewry to build the state of Israel and then by helping strengthen Israeli society. JAFI today can and should play an instrumental role in strengthening Jewish identity by offering Israel experiences and seeing that Jewish education is available to every Jew in the world; by making sure that unique programs of partnership are developed between Israeli communities and the Diaspora; and we have to bring our partnership to every campus wherever Jewish students are studying.

Q Do you believe that peace is still possible in the Middle East?

A I am still a big believer in peace, but I believe that peace will come only together with developing free and democratic societies. You cannot build peace by strengthening dictators and terrorist regimes, and that's, unfortunately, one of the big mistakes of the free world when, in the past, through its attempts to build peace by appeasing; whether in Nazi Germany or Soviet Communist Russia, all of which failed. But, a strong position of supporting human rights activists and democracy behind the iron curtain brought much success. We will never achieve peace if our enemies feel that we are weak. To be strong as Jews, we must have strong identities. It was true in the FSU when my fight as a Zionist was strengthened by my fight as a human rights activist, and it's true today.

Q How can Jews best counter the ongoing attempts to delegitimize Israel?

A A few years ago, I identified this new wave of anti-Semitism – which is based on delegitimization, double-standards and demonization, as the 3-D principle. It can only be successful if the world is losing its moral clarity, and refuses to see the difference between democratic societies and dictatorial regimes which need wars to control its own citizens. It has to be resisted; it has to be explained; and our first target has to be world Jewry and especially the young generation of Jews on campuses; those who are under constant pressure by the enemy, and they are those whose Jewish identity and sense of Jewish pride has to be strengthened the most. I know that this young generation has a strong desire to connect themselves to Israel; to hear that the truth is on our side. That's why campuses have become an important battlefield in our work and why I, as the Chair of the Jewish Agency, want to broaden our partnership and cooperation with Jewish communities and their campuses. Jews want to feel proud. I'll give you an example of the importance of universal Jewish pride. Toronto's Federation decided to answer the anti-Semitic act of the Toronto Film Festival recently. There were so many skeptics; so many who said 'the world is against us; Hollywood Jews are different, they don't understand us; they distance themselves from us….' But UJA appealed to the Hollywood Jews' common sense and they responded. So, we discovered that we have more friends and more power when we come together to defend our cause."

Israeli money manager sets up shop in Toronto

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Meir Cohen, the CEO of the new Toronto branch of BSP Funds, the first Israeli-based money management firm to have a physical Canadian presence, said he's confident the investment opportunities offered by his firm will help Canadians bounce back from the latest economic crisis.

Meir Cohen

BSP Funds Canada Inc., which is registered with the Ontario Securities Commission and has been operating since October, was established to attract investors outside of Israel, and to look for other investment opportunities that would benefit its investors.

Cohen, a 33-year-old Toronto-native, spent eight years as vice-president of Bull Capital Management Inc., a wealth management firm in Toronto, before he was approached by a BSP Fund partner who has been temporarily living in Toronto for the past few years.

"He approached me at the beginning of 2009. I spent my time doing due diligence on the firm and on the people in the firm, and I was very impressed with what I saw, and I made the decision that there is great potential and to start something with them," said Cohen, a Yeshiva University and Schulich School of Business graduate.

The money management firm, which launched in 2005, is based in Herzliya, Israel, and employs nine Israeli partners, with Cohen being the only Canadian employee.

Cohen said BSP Canada joined the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce to raise awareness about the firm and plans to organize informational events to present topics that would be of interest to potential investors and members of the chamber.

He said the firm targets accredited investors – high-net-worth individuals and institutions – who are looking to invest for a number of years.

"It's meant to be a longer-term strategy… Our long-term target return is about 10 per cent per year net of fees. If we're doing our job over time – of course we don't guarantee anything – we should have [an average of a] 10 per cent return every year," he said.

"This is meant to be for someone who has a larger portfolio and basically can afford to put some of it aside and let it grow over time, as opposed to someone who is younger and might need income from the portfolio."

Cohen explained that BSP makes money by putting together a hedge fund that invests in other hedge funds.

"The hedge funds that we are investing in typically, right now, happen to be based in the U.S. and the U.K., but the hedge fund that we're running itself is managed out of Israel… As these funds go up in value and as the values of the securities in the portfolios goes up, we make money and our investors make money."

Cohen said the firm invests in everything from equities to bonds and manage about $250 million (US).

"A big part of our ability to find the right investments is by utilizing our software that was built by our team in Israel, which identifies trends in the hedge funds we're investing in and combines the different hedge fund strategies together to obtain the optimal results."

He said that the BSP partners chose to open an office in Canada, rather than the United States, because they felt there was more opportunity for growth here.

"We saw an opportunity to emerge as one of the top hedge funds in Canada because Canada is less developed that the U.S."

He added that the difficult economic climate was perceived as an opportunity to succeed rather than an obstacle.

"With every crisis comes an opportunity… We saw that it was a chance for us to step in and gain market share," Cohen said.

"This speaks to the confidence that we have in what we do. That we were investing in our business at a time when times were tough in the economy and the markets."

He acknowledged that many people are still nervous about how to invest their money in the wakes of a recession that led many Canadians to lose much of their savings.

"But our strategy is designed specifically to be a more conservative strategy and meant to protect [their savings] should we go through another period like we did last year. Our fund is designed to do well regardless of what is happening in the market environment."

The alternative to investing is to leave their money in cash and "cash pays almost nothing today, so really it's a way for people to get back into the markets without actually investing fully in the market," Cohen said.

"The way our fund works is that we're doing a number of different strategies so that if the market drops 50 per cent like it did last year, we don't drop 50, we drop a fraction of what the market drops."

A SELECTION OF KOSHER WINES

CANADIAN ZIONIST FEDERATION
36TH WORLD ZIONIST CONGRESS ELECTIONS

The World Zionist Organization has determined that a World Zionist Congress will take place in June, 2010. An international election of delegates to this Congress will take place approximately three months prior to the Congress unless an agreed list is tabled. In Canada, the right to vote for delegates to this Congress will be determined by membership in a member organization of the Canadian Zionist Federation in good standing on December 31, 2009 and in compliance with dues requirements for 2009, or by individual membership, on or before December 31, 2009, and in compliance with dues requirements for 2009. In addition, only persons of 18 years of age or older on June 30, 2009 will be entitled to vote.

The right to propose an agreed list will be determined by membership in a member organization of the Canadian Zionist Federation in good standing on December 10, 2009, and in compliance with dues requirements for 2009, and will require the submission of a slate by December 10, 2009.

a. Existing organizations. In accordance with the constitution of the Canadian Zionist Federation, and the decision of the Zionist Court existing organizations wishing to maintain their good standing so as to permit their members to vote in the Congress election must have paid the fee in the amount determined by the National Executive. Information regarding the fee may be obtained by contacting the C.Z.F. office as set out below. In the event of failure to pay, an organization shall be suspended until it shall have complied with the provisions of the constitution of the Canadian Zionist Federation as to re-instatement including payment of a 20% surcharge on all amounts in arrears.

Existing organizations wishing to maintain their good standing so as to permit the proposal in an agreed list must have complied with the foregoing by December 10, 2009. In order to facilitate the proposal of agreed lists, all existing organizations must propose a slate by December 10, 2009.

For existing organizations, only members who have been named in the membership list for the year ending December 31, 2009 for existing organizations in good standing for the year ending December 31, 2009 are entitled to vote in the election, provided the organization is in compliance with dues requirements for 2010. Information regarding the fee may be obtained by contacting the C.Z.F. office as set out below.

b. New organizations. Any organization not currently a member in good standing of the Canadian Zionist Federation, and not in default of its obligations to the Canadian Zionist Federation, wishing to become a member organization of the Canadian Zionist Federation in time to permit its members to vote in the Congress election must on or before December 31, 2009

1. apply and adhere to the aims and objectives of the CZF as set out in its constitution;
2. meet the criteria set forth by the National Executive of the CZF as to submission of its members' names and payment of fees or receive approval by the National Executive and make payment of a stipulated annual fee in lieu of dues per capita, for the year ending December 31, 2009;
3. encourage its members to fulfill their obligations toward the Keren Hayesod-United Israel Appeal, the U.J.A. and the Jewish National Fund
4. maintain a membership of no less than 300 individuals;
5. conduct Zionist activities in more than one region of the C Z F: and
6. be in compliance with dues requirements for 2009.

Information regarding the dues may be obtained by contacting the C.Z.F. office as set out below.

If a new organization wishes to propose an agreed list or be considered in an agreed list it must have complied with the foregoing by December 10, 2009 and provided a slate for election by such date.

Members who have been named in the membership list for the year ending December 31, 2009, for new organizations in good standing for the year ending December 31, 2009 are entitled to vote in the Congress election, provided the organization is in compliance with dues requirements for 2009 and 2010. Information regarding the dues may be obtained by contacting the C.Z.F. office as set out below.

c. Individual members. Only individuals who are members of the C. Z. F. for the year ending December 31, 2009 are entitled to vote in the election. Individuals may join the C. Z. F. by signing a membership application indicating their acceptance of the Jerusalem program and paying the membership fee prescribed by the National Executive of the C. Z. F. Such individuals must be in compliance with dues requirements for 2010. Dues requirements may be obtained by contacting the C. Z. F. Office as set out below.

Book explains 'wide gulf between Israel and Arab world'

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

A new book, Start-Up Nation: The Story of Israel's Economic Miracle, by Dan Senor and Saul Singer, is receiving a lot of attention in the North American media.

Recently, Canadian Business magazine and the National Post featured major excerpts.

Introducing an interview with Senor in the Financial Post ("Israel's startup spirit," Nov. 28; also posted on CBC.ca.), reporter Eric Lam wrote: "Ever since Israel was born in 1948, smack in the middle of a hornet's nest of hatred and resentment, the little country that couldn't has done nothing but thrive… [Start-Up Nation] looks at how Israel's disadvantages – a hostile environment, constant threat of annihilation, isolation from the outside world – have actually helped make the country a hotbed for entrepreneurs."

How hot? As Senor told Lam: "There are more Israeli companies on Nasdaq than any other foreign country in the world, more global venture capital on a per-capita basis going into Israel than any other country. On an absolute basis, Israel attracts as much venture capital as the United Kingdom. How did the Israelis pull this off in the least likely of circumstances?"

Senor's answer is that Israel contains "the most dynamic combination of entrepreneurialism and innovation in the world today." He added: "Our point is that not only does Israel have adverse circumstances, but [Israelis] have an outlook on life and an ethos that includes a motivation to take problems and turn them into advantages."

CNN's Fareed Zakaria GPS program named Start-Up Nation its "book of the week." On the Nov. 8 show, host Fareed Zakaria asked: "Why is it that Israel, a nation of just seven million people, constantly at war since its creation, has become the capital of start-ups? Believe it or not, Israel has produced more of them than Japan, China or India [with a combined population of about 2.5 billion]."

Zakaria also commented on the impact of the book's findings for Israel's immediate neighbours: "It's a book, I think, that every single Arab businessman, Arab bureaucrat, and Arab politician should read, because it explains this wide gulf between Israel and the Arab world."

This should not be a cause for gloating, but rather a recognition that the Arab world could use Israel as a model to unleash its entrepreneurial talent, just as Israel's democracy serves as a model for the Palestinian political process.

However, with some exceptions such as the recent upsurge of economic growth in the West Bank (supported by Israel), the Arab world does little to encourage the sort of change that would lead to economic progress. Anything but.

As Thomas Friedman noted in the New York Times ("America vs. The Narrative" Nov. 28) too many Arab intellectuals and leaders are gripped by the theory that there is "a grand 'American-Crusader-Zionist conspiracy' to keep Muslims down."

Friedman quoted a Jordanian-born counterterrorism expert who said: "This narrative is now omnipresent in Arab and Muslim communities in the region and in migrant communities around the world. These communities are bombarded with this narrative in huge doses and on a daily basis. [It says] the West, and right now mostly the U.S. and Israel, is single-handedly and completely responsible for all the grievances of the Arab and the Muslim worlds."

Freidman added: "This narrative suits Arab governments. It allows them to deflect onto America all of their people's grievances over why their countries are falling behind."

Many analysts have made the same point: until leaders in Arab and Muslim communities take responsibility for their failures instead of promoting conspiracy theories, they will continue to fall further behind the rest of the world, and will remain breeding grounds for extremism.

Estrelly's Foundation helps needy Israeli children

Max Benaim, a Jewish community volunteer in Toronto and founder of Estrelly's Foundation – named in honour of his late sister – raised enough money to provide underprivileged Israeli children with a group bar and bat mitzvah celebration at the Kotel in Jerusalem last month. Thirty-four boys, 32 girls and their parents were bused in from Kiryat Shmonah, Kiryat Malachi and Jerusalem to take part. This was the second time in as many years that Benaim turned to Toronto's Sephardi Jewish community to raise money for the bar mitzvah program. Fifteen people from the Toronto community came with Benaim to Israel to take part in the Nov. 17 celebration. The ceremony at the Kotel was followed by a luncheon and dancing at the Sephardic Educational Center in Jerusalem, which was also attended by Kiryat Shmonah mayor Nissim Malka. All the bar and bat mitzvah children received gifts, which included siddurs, tfillin and tallitot.

Orthodox students have support on campus, panel says

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Jewish student group leaders, rabbis and Orthodox Jewish students held a panel discussion last week to let concerned community members know that there are many opportunities available for Orthodox Jewish students on secular campuses.

The Orthodox Union's Heshe and Harriet Seif Jewish Learning Initiative on Campus (JLIC), a North American program that helps Orthodox students balance their Jewish upbringing with living in a secular world, in conjunction with Hillel of Greater Toronto, invited parents and university-bound students to Bnei Akiva's Yeshivat Or Chaim for a lecture titled "Observant Jewish Life on the Secular College Campus."

As a York University graduate, Toronto's JLIC program director Rabbi Aaron Greenberg – who, with his wife Miriam, organizes weekly lectures, daily services, and peer-to-peer learning opportunities at York University and the University of Toronto – said he "has a pretty good handle on what life is like on campus."

He said he most often gets questions from parents about what life will be like there for kids who have grown up in the Jewish day school system.

"What we try to do at the JLIC and Hillel is provide them with a safe environment – safe in terms of a religious perspective, a Jewish perspective, and safe in terms of having a safe place to be with friends."

For example, he said that earlier that day, there were three minyanim at the York campus – one for Shacharit, one for Minchah and one for Ma'ariv.

But Rabbi Scot Berman, headmaster of Toronto's Bnei Akiva Schools, said that both parents and students need to evaluate some of the "dangers" that await Jewish students on secular campuses.

"I don't want to present this as the outside world being the boogeyman. There are many wonderful things that campus life has to offer our students."

But, Rabbi Berman added, if he could convince all his students to continue their Jewish education by going to Jewish post-secondary institutions, he would.

"Realistically speaking, that is not going to be the choice for many of our students, and they will be going to campuses… [where] there are real dangers that our kids are exposed to for the first time intellectually as things come out at them."

He said many parents and students are concerned about how "general knowledge will come into conflict for the first time and challenge for the first time some of their core beliefs.

"When someone, for 13 or 14 years, is in a cocoon, a warm and comforting cocoon, that we support and recommend and promote all through their day school years, they finally break out into a much broader community and there are those dangers," Rabbi Berman said.

"There is the need to continue to be very, very vigilant in taking advantage of all the services that exist today that never existed before."

He said that if students stop studying and socializing with "like-minded people, we can begin to lessen our commitment [to Judaism] before we even realize it."

Rabbi Josh Ross, JLIC's associate director, said that he doesn't believe that students pull away from their Jewish upbringing or do poorly in school because of a secular education or environment, but because universities lack the kind of structure that students grew accustomed to in the Jewish school system.

But Zac Kaye, Hillel of Greater Toronto's executive director, said that the changes on campus over the past few years help to provide Orthodox students with the sense of structure and community they grew up with.

Kaye said that there are about 18,000 Jewish students in Toronto-area universities, and about 95 per cent of those students are commuters and live at home.

"Our goal, from the very beginning, when we set up Hillel, was that we would try to reach out to different denominational groups on campus. One thing that Hillel realized… was that Hillel alone couldn't do the job that it said it could do in the previous 30 or 40 years of its existence – that it be all things to all people – and [realized] that we would have to seek partnerships."

Kaye said that with the emphasis on engaging Jews who were at risk for assimilating, Orthodox students on campus "were being left behind… we didn't really have to worry about them."

Hillel did what it could to create programming aimed at Orthodox students, but, "what we were hearing from the students is that they were looking more for the educational component," Kaye added.

He said that the partnership between Hillel and JLIC makes that kind of programming possible, and it's "something really very special and it is something the Orthodox community should really value."

Micha Gasner, a first-year York student who studied at Eitz Chaim Day School, Ulpanat Orot Girls School and then for a year in Israel after she graduated from high school, said that she was nervous about what a secular institution would have in store for her.

"I was a little shocked in the beginning to have 500 people in a chemistry lesson, instead of 10 really good friends in my Chumash class or in my chemistry class, where my teacher knows me and I know him and I can ask him questions and for extra help," Gasner said.

University of Manitoba revives Judaic studies

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

For the first time in 20 years, the faculty of arts at the University of Manitoba (U of M) is offering students the ability to graduate with a minor in Judaic studies.

The Judaic studies program at U of M was the first of its kind in Canada when it was founded in 1950, but in 1989, the program was reduced in scope, and most degree options were dropped.

Moshe Nahir, a professor in the school's linguistics department, co-ordinated the reduced program until 2009, ensuring the survival of the language component by offering classes in Hebrew at all levels.

The newly revived Judaic studies program is headed by program co-ordinators Benjamin Baader, a history professor, and Justin Jaron Lewis, a professor in the department of religion.

Baader specializes in German Jewish history and Jewish historiography, while Lewis specializes in mystical and narrative aspects of Jewish religious tradition.

Nahir continues to offer his Hebrew language class, and Rachela Secter, a professor in the department of German and Slavic studies who teaches Yiddish, is another faculty member involved with the program.

"This academic year, students can take classes in Hebrew Bible, Talmud, contemporary Judaism, Middle East politics and Zionism, among many many others," Baader said.

The program "promotes the study of Jewish civilization, of Jewish religious expressions and traditions, and of Jewish cultural, social and political formations," Baader added.

"In the classes we are offering this fall, we have about 100 students enrolled, both Jewish and non-Jewish. The class on the history of anti-Semitism and the Holocaust and the Yiddish language class have the largest enrolments."

Lewis said that his most popular course is contemporary Judaism, and he hopes that "enrolment will increase over time as the Jewish component of religious studies takes root again."

There are plans to continue to develop the Yiddish language element of the program.

"With the support of the I.L. Peretz Folk School Endowment Trust Foundation and the dean of arts [Richard Sigurdson], we are planning to offer an advanced Yiddish class next year, and we are currently talking to the Gray Academy of Jewish Education [high school] to co-ordinate our Yiddish language and culture curriculum with theirs," Baader said.

Notwithstanding that U of M is facing difficult economic challenges, Baader is optimistic that the newly revived program won't be downsized.

"The dean of arts is committed to supporting the nascent program in this very difficult time, though resources are more than tight. Community support will remain crucial to making the program viable," Baader said, adding that he and Lewis are working hard to build the program with the means available to them.

They hope that with support from students and the public, the program will continue to grow and one day it will again be able to offer a major.

But, Baader added, "we will need community support to make this possible."

He said there has been talk of launching a campaign to raise money for a professorship, but "there are no immediate plans to move forward. However, donations in support of the current program are always welcome."

Infrastructure in place

She said that she had to make an effort to incorporate Jewish learning experiences into her day between classes.

"Part of my schedule on Monday is that… I have a shiur for parshah and that is part of my schedule. I go from my chemistry class and I go to the shiur and there are always like, 10 or 12 girls there. Today I was able to go to a Minchah, and it's nice that there is a minyan and I can go to a Minchah when I want to," Gasner said.

David Elmaleh, an Or Chaim graduate and currently an Osgoode Hall law school student at York, said Jewish life on campus has evolved over the last five years.

He said that when he first arrived on campus, there were a lot of religious Jews, but they weren't "organized and mobilized."

"We now have an infrastructure in place that encourages us to attend certain events."

He said that while he appreciated the efforts made by Hillel to create programming to attract the frum community on campus, its partnership with JLIC gives them many more options and opportunities to stay involved.

"Before, a lot of the classes had to be more general and broad because there was such a wide array of students, whereas now we have beginner classes, we have advanced classes… so really, you can find a shiur, a class, that works for you and fits in with your needs," Elmaleh said.

He added that he is grateful for the opportunity to forge a relationship with a rabbi and have access to someone who can respond to his halachic and religious questions and concerns, but he's also grateful for more opportunities for shidduchim.

"I know it may not be on the parents' minds, but from the student perspective, there are a lot of opportunities to meet people at the different events… Because of the JLIC and the central role they play in bringing students of similar backgrounds together, it really enhances the social aspect of university life, which is also very important."

Elmaleh spoke briefly about the issue of anti-Semitism on campus and said that although there may be incidents of anti-Semitism on secular campuses, "there is a tremendous support system in place.

"We have people to talk to, who tell us what to do and who to confront. I know at Hillel there is a system in place if you want to file a complaint with the university, they help us go through it."

Kaye, responding to concerns about anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiments both from students and faculty, said that he believes Jewish day schools should do more to prepare students for the challenges they will face on campus.

Liberals, Tories wrangle over Canada's role at Durban I

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Speaker Peter Milliken refused to be drawn into the continuing squabbles between the Liberals and Conservatives in the House of Commons over what the truth is about Canada's participation in the World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa eight years ago.

Milliken affirmed that it's up to the procedures and house affairs committee to decide, if it sees fit, whether the claim made in a Conservative flyer sent last month to households in Liberal ridings with significant Jewish populations that the Liberal government of the day "willingly participated in overtly anti-Semitic Durban I" is factual.

On Nov. 30, MPs voted 151-137 in favour of a motion presented by Liberal Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler that the flyer represents a breach of parliamentary privilege. The week before Milliken decided that a "prima facie" breach had occurred and that Cotler's reputation and ability to perform his parliamentary functions have been hurt.

Mount Royal, where about 30 per cent of the electorate is Jewish, was one of the ridings where the flyer was mailed. Cotler, however, is not mentioned in the flyer.

The committee was set to hold its first hearing on the matter Dec. 8, when Cotler was scheduled to make a submission.

The matter took a new turn on Nov. 30, when National Post columnist John Ivison wrote that former Israeli ambassador to Canada Alan Baker disputed Cotler's claim that the Israeli government had asked the Canadian government to remain at the 2001 Durban conference.

Baker said Israel asked Canada to withdraw, but after Ottawa directed the delegation to remain, Israel asked the Canadians to do what they could to tone down the conference's final resolution.

The Jewish community denounced the conference as a platform for anti-Israel and anti-Semitic rhetoric.

Baker, who described himself as the head of the Israeli delegation at Durban, is quoted as saying that Israel asked Canada, the United States and some European countries to withdraw from the conference. Cotler, as well as the signatories to a Nov. 23 open letter to Prime Minister Stephen Harper, say Canada stayed at the conference at the request of the Israeli government. Cotler, a Liberal MP at the time, was a member of the Canadian delegation.

> 'It was important that Canadians led the battle in Durban'

The next day, Manitoba Conservative MP Candice Hoeppner rose in the House to charge that the Liberal Party has been "caught red-handed misleading Canadians about its record on Israel," citing Baker's contradiction of Cotler's claim and asked for an apology.

Cotler then rose to make a "correction" for the parliamentary record.

He stated that Baker did not head the Israeli delegation at Durban. "The person who headed the delegation was Rabbi Michael Melchior, then a deputy foreign minister of Israel, who publicly commended the Canadian government for staying in Durban to combat the anti-Semitism there. That is a matter of public record and that can be verified."

Cotler also noted that Hedy Fry, who headed the Canadian delegation and continues to sit as a Liberal MP from Vancouver, "has said that she was never contacted by Mr. Baker and never was asked to leave Durban."

Cotler stressed that the Canadian delegation "made its own independent decision to stay… willingly to combat the anti-Semitism in Durban. This was publicly commended by the Israeli government."

He added that other governments, besides Israel, and non-governmental organizations also asked Canada to remain in Durban.

The Tory flyer makes comparisons between the Conservatives' and Liberals' record on Israel, anti-Semitism and terrorism. It boasts that the Harper government "led the world in refusing participation in [the] Durban II hate-fest against Israel" earlier this year. The flyer has not been withdrawn from circulation.

On Dec. 2, Ivison reported on his interview with Rabbi Melchior, who said he directed the Israeli delegation from Jerusalem. Rabbi Melchior said the Israeli government, then led by prime minister Ariel Sharon, did not ask Canada or any other delegation to leave Durban. Apparently, it did not explicitly asked Canada to remain either. "Not necessarily to stay, but it was important for us that Canadians led the battle in Durban against any anti-Semitic resolution."

Cotler said in an interview with The CJN that the turnout for the vote on his motion – on a Monday night – drew an unusually high turnout, and that Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff cancelled his scheduled address to major donors to the party at a Montreal event in order to be present. Harper was also present. The motion had the support of all of the opposition parties.

Cotler said the Conservatives are "trying to undermine my credibility," because his staunch support of Israel and Jewish concerns contradicts their assertion that the Liberals are soft on such issues.

But Pierre Poilievre, Harper's parliamentary secretary, contended that the "Conservative party has reversed the Liberal policy on the Middle East."

OU, NCSY honour PM Harper

Compiled by CJN Staff

Leaders from the Orthodox Union (OU) and NCSY Canada were in Ottawa last week to present the organizations' Outstanding Award of Merit to Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. The award was presented in recognition of his steadfast and principled leadership, his unwavering support for Israel and the Jewish community and his determination to fight anti-Semitism wherever it appears.

"We were delighted that the prime minister took the time to meet with us so that we could thank him on behalf of an appreciative community," said tribute event co-chair Philip Reichmann.

"Prime Minister Harper has consistently demonstrated a principled and just stance on foreign affairs, earning him a leading role amongst the world's statesmen."

The delegations from the OU and NCSY also met with a number of ministers and MPs including the leader of the Opposition Michael Ignatieff, Minister of State for Foreign Affairs (Americas) Peter Kent and parliamentary secretary to the prime minister Pierre Poilievre. Among a number of policy discussions and issues of concern to the Canadian Orthodox Jewish community, the delegation asserted the rights of Jewish citizens to legally build homes throughout the Land of Israel. Further meetings included senior members of the prime minister's cabinet.

"While we expressed our deep appreciation to the prime minister, we also had frank and honest discussions on a range of issues, including the sovereignty and centrality of Jerusalem; the regional and global risks posed by Iran and the terrorist groups they support; as well as Bill C35 – Canada's proposed anti-terrorism law – a bill which we believe is, simply, not strong enough," said Laurence Zeifman, president of OU Canada.

"We're certain that these issues, which are vital to Canada's Orthodox Jewish community, were heard and well understood during our visit, and we are confident the prime minister will address these in the same responsible and considerate manner he has demonstrated to date," adds Zeifman.

Rabbi Glenn Black, CEO of NCSY Canada notes that in his organization's efforts to engage Jewish youth and teach them about the responsibilities of citizenship, "we often use role models to exemplify the high personal standards of conscience and courage demanded by both Canadian and Jewish traditions.

"Prime Minister Harper is often the example we cite, as time and again, he has demonstrated that he is prepared to stand up for what is right, even when it is not popular, and even under significant international pressure," adds Rabbi Black.

Schools will have to meet standards to get subsidies

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish day schools in Montreal that want money from Federation CJA to subsidize students who don't pay full tuition will in the coming years have to be accredited by a non-governmental Canadian organization that sets standards for independent schools.

By 2012, any school, including even the most Orthodox, seeking community assistance must at least have begun the process of applying for accreditation from the Canadian Educational Standards Institute (CESI).

Currently, two Montreal Jewish schools are accredited with CESI: Akiva School and Hebrew Academy, and Jewish People's and Peretz Schools/Bialik High School is a candidate.

The federation has for a few years tried to persuade day schools to seek CESI accreditation voluntarily. But the decision to tie federation support to adherence to standards set by an outside body is a major recommendation of a review of the Jewish schools by the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre (BJEC), a federation agency.

The federation allocates close to $3 million annually toward tuition assistance.

Many of Montreal's prestigious anglophone private schools are CESI-accredited, including Lower Canada College, Selwyn House and The Study.

CESI, based in St. Catharines, Ont., is a voluntary organization dedicated to improving private schools and helping its members maintain excellence. It evaluates both teaching practices and management, and is especially vigilant about a school's ability to plan for the future and sustain quality.

In 2002, it began reviewing schools according to a 12-point guideline. Schools are to be reassessed every seven years.

New BJEC president Paul Levine and executive director Danyael Cantor said the goal of CESI is to set the highest standards without seeking to homogenize schools into one model. There is no threat to a school's autonomy or Jewish character, they said.

"But it will help them become the best they can be," Levine said.

The BJEC says five other schools have indicated they will enter the CESI process: Solomon Schechter Academy, Beth Rivkah Academy, UTT/Herzliah, Hebrew Foundation School and Ecole Maïmonide

Such accreditation should assure parents that their children will get at least as high a quality of education at a Jewish school as at a private one, Levine said. Private schools are competition for the mainstream Jewish schools, especially at the high school level. The BJEC estimates that about 40 per cent of Jewish teens attend a Jewish day school.

"Parents are demanding quality. They want excellence in the secular component of the curriculum, and we do not want students to leave the day school system," Levine said. "Our schools have to change. They have to re-invigorate and re-invent themselves."

The federation will cover the cost to the school of the 18-month CESI accreditation process. The BJEC will assist schools in "first getting up to speed" to be ready for that rigorous review.

According to information from CESI, it recognizes "the independence, integrity and uniqueness" of each school and evaluates them "in terms of their own mission, vision and values."

Levine and Cantor are confident that even chassidic schools can benefit from accreditation. They point out that the two Montreal Jewish schools already accredited differ in their philosophies. Hebrew Academy is modern Orthodox, while Akiva embraces all Jewish religious expressions.

The accreditation process begins with an internal evaluation by the school of all its programs and operations. The school is then visited by a CESI committee, which spends four days in the school meeting with all parties involved. The committee will recommend changes it feels are necessary.

Although Solomon Schechter Academy will undertake the CESI process, its principal, Shimshon Hamerman, said he's doing so with reservations.

"It's very controversial," he said, not because CESI isn't respected in the educational field or because he doesn't think his school could benefit from its expertise.

Cost is a big factor. Although the federation has said it will subsidize the initial process, Hamerman notes that accredited schools must pay an annual fee based on the number of students in the order of $17 each, and that may be difficult for some schools.

The CESI standard for governance will mean a major shift for Solomon Schechter. Traditionally, the board of directors, whose members are parents, has been the final authority at Solomon Schechter, an elementary school with 650 students. Other administrative committees are also composed of parents.

The CESI model emphasizes the power of the professional "head of school," a position that's uncommon among Montreal Jewish schools, with volunteer boards concerning themselves more with strategic thinking than day-to-day operations.

Hamerman thinks that kind of restructuring will make it harder to keep parents engaged in schools. He's also concerned that professional administrators' jobs will be less secure.

But Hamerman affirmed that evaluation and accreditation by a respected body such as CESI is "a very good thing" for education. Just the process of self-evaluation is beneficial because it forces schools to rethink their practices and policies, he said.

"You get into your way of doing things, and you think it is the best in the world. Only when you verify yourself against a standard can you become better… But only in five years' time will I be able to tell you if it worked."

He recently witnessed a CESI visit to a school in Toronto and was astonished at its thoroughness.

"Sixteen top-notch professionals from across the country came to the school for three days, and they went over everything from cleanliness to admissions policy to the football field to communication between parents and teachers – every detail. Then the school got an objective, arm's-length report.

"Where else are you going to get that? They do not impose anything. They look at how you deliver the product you claim to have."

At Beth Rivkah Academy – which has about 600 female students in elementary and high school and is under Lubavitch auspices – executive director Rabbi Mendel Marasow is enthusiastic about the CESI process. In fact, Beth Rivkah began the initial phase of self-evaluation about three or four years ago, but stopped midway through because its small administrative staff had to focus their attention on "other fires," he said.

"The internal audit was very healthy, but not easy. In fact, [it was] extremely painful," he said. "No one likes to look at themselves in the mirror, and CESI makes you do that."

Elsewhere in Canada, Winnipeg's Gray Academy of Jewish Education is CESI-accredited.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Revamped BJEC takes more hands-on approach

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The move toward accreditation of Montreal's Jewish day schools by the Canadian Educational Standards Institute comes after the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre (BJEC) itself has been restructured and is re-evaluating its mission.

Traditionally, the agency, once known as the Jewish Education Council, has provided pedagogical support to Jewish schools and assisted in informal Jewish education.

New BJEC president Paul Levine heads a new streamlined board composed of people actively associated with issue of Jewish identity. The chartered accountant has long been involved in Jewish education, although he himself is a graduate of public schools. In the 1990s, he was president of Solomon Schechter Academy, which his four children attended, and his wife Sharon was later president of United Talmud Torahs/Herzliah High Schools.

Executive director Danyael Cantor, who was previously the federation's executive vice-president, is also relatively fresh, having assumed his current post in July 2008.

The BJEC is now taking a more active role in the way day schools are run after a number of crises in the system. It's not a school board and can't dictate to schools how to do things, but increasingly the schools themselves are recognizing they can benefit from outside expertise, especially in the areas of finances and governance, Levine said.

Some schools have boards that are too big to be effective, others have trouble finding new leadership. Sometimes there is confusion over the roles of the lay and professional administrators.

"There are boards that are much too involved in operational issues rather than fundraising and the larger picture," Cantor said.

The schools are also facing challenges in meeting the curriculum requirements set by the Quebec government.

Last year, the BJEC hired Toronto-based consultant Michael Miloff to study the situation of the schools. The agency also picked the brains of 40 focus groups, involving about 250 people from interested sectors of the community to find out how the BJEC could best fulfil its role.

The general response was that they wanted BJEC to be more involved in the schools, Levine said. "Among the schools themselves there is a willingness to work together, where previously they would have competed with each other," Cantor added.

This year, the BJEC, with a federation Gen J grant, engaged American consultant Marcy Balogh, from the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education, for a year-long study of the governance of the schools, which concludes this month. Schools involved are Akiva, Beth Rivkah Academy, Hebrew Academy, Hebrew Foundation School, JPPS/Bialik, Ecole Maïmonide, Solomon Schechter, and UTT/Herzliah.

The revamped BJEC intends to also reach out more to Jewish children who are not enrolled in day schools, as well as to college-aged youth and young adults through ways that are meaningful to them. Possible areas are the environment, technology, sports, the arts and social action, which can be tied in with a Jewish experience.

"We are evaluating all our programs that donors have a stake in," Levine said. "In the past, we were not able to tell [objectively] if they were a success. Now we have scorecards, measures to evaluate them, and we will be able to show data on how they are doing."

Anti-Israel protesters thwarted as underwear sales soar

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Anti-Israel demonstrations outside Mountain Equipment Co-op (MEC) stores on Saturday, Nov. 28, were small but orderly, with only 12 protesters outside the company's Vancouver store, 10 outside the Calgary store and none outside the Toronto outlet.

The protesters were there to show their disapproval of the retail co-operative's sourcing policy, in particular its contract to source two products from Israel: underwear and hydration systems for backpacks.

To demonstrate their support for MEC's sourcing practices, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) encouraged Jewish communities throughout Canada to participate in its "Buycott Israel" program by buying Israeli products at the store the following day.

The encouragement worked, and shoppers turned out in large numbers Nov. 29 to purchase large quantities of Israel-made underwear.

"We track sales on a four-week-period basis," said MEC spokesperson Tim Southam. "The 'buycott' definitely drove some sales, and the sales for men's and women's seamless long underwear that day were the highest in terms of number of units sold for the period."

Nationwide, 69 per cent of men's long underwear for that four-week period were sold on Sunday, and 76 per cent of women's long underwear. The highest number of units of underwear sold was in Calgary, Southam said.

"This clearly demonstrates that the Canadian public supports MEC's ethical sourcing policy and rejects efforts to politicize the activities of one of Canada's most socially conscious merchandisers," said Michael Elterman, chair of the CIC's Pacific region.

An earlier attempt to force MEC to boycott Israeli goods was defeated by MEC members at the co-op's annual general meeting last May.

A similar community-organized effort to thwart a boycott of Israeli wines took place in Toronto last April.

Once she's 18 years old, recalculate child support

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator for 28 years

Question: I pay child support for my 17-year-old who lives with her mother. She turns 18 during the school year; I pay the table amount for child support. Next academic year she will be attending Queen's University and commuting back to Toronto on the odd weekend and school breaks; I will only live with her during the summer vacation. She will likely have a summer job as a camp counselor, like last year. Am I to pay the same amount of child support? My wife earns the same amount of income as I do, about $70,000 yearly. As it is we will be splitting the costs of the child's post-secondary education, including tuition fees, residence, books, etc.

Answer: Under the Child Support Guidelines, you no longer automatically pay the amount stipulated for child support tied to your gross yearly income once the child turns 18. That amount is just one factor to consider. In your situation, the court will consider that you both are already paying your proportionate share of the child's living costs and educational costs at Queen's University and that she is certainly not living at home "full-time" any longer. However, from my reading of the Court's decisions on facts such as yours, the judges have ruled that the child's mother still has substantial costs in keeping a "home base" for your child when she comes home; i.e. that extra bedroom and facilities, especially for those special weekends, school breaks and summer holidays.

The Ontario Court of Appeal has also recently ruled that the child herself has to contribute something towards her schooling, either from her own assets (if inherited), savings or summer earnings to relieve the burden on the parents. The end result is that, depending on the size of the payer's income, the court may or may not modify the basic amount of child support (called the "table amount") that he or she must pay based upon his or her gross yearly income. In your particular case, I suspect there may be some reduction from the table amount given that both of you earn the same amount of income.

However, if you were earning $150,000 yearly I would be less certain a judge would make any modification. The difficult questions begin to arise when the adult child begins bouncing back and forth between the two parental homes, begins working "co-op", starts taking "half-time" courses, moves in "part-time" with her boyfriend, stops communicating with Dad, or drops out because of illness. There are no easy answers.

On behalf of my family, and all of us at Garfin Zeidenberg, I wish you and your family a happy and healthy Chanukah.

14% of Jews in Canada are Israelis, study claims

The poverty rate of the general Jewish population was 13.4 per cent. By comparison, the poverty rate for non-Jews in general was 16.3 per cent.

Harris, in his study, said that Israeli immigrants talked of the large social gap between themselves and Canadian-born Jews.

Even Israelis who held Canadian citizenship found it hard to express strong feelings toward their Canadian identity, Harris noted.

The majority of Israeli immigrants, he added, are strongly connected to their Israeli identity.

Harris discovered that Israeli immigrants don't feel guilty about having left Israel, unlike in previous years.

Some told Harris they had paid their dues by serving in the Israel Defence Forces

Harris suggested that many Israelis are no longer considering the possibility of returning to Israel.

They have been influenced by the second Palestinian uprising, Israel's leadership crisis, a lack of trust in politicians and public corruption.

Shahar said that while sabras have been coming to Canada since the 1960s, more have arrived since the 1990s and the eruption of the second intifadah in September 2000.

Israel's ambassador to Canada, Miriam Ziv, declined to comment on Harris' findings. But Gissin said that Israeli immigrants in Canada have a strong sense of belonging to Israel, and their children usually feel a special kinship with Israel.

In the last few years, hundreds of Israelis in Canada, many the children of immigrants, have made aliyah.

The migration is encouraged by the consulate and supported by the Jewish community in Canada, he said.

In the past, due to the unique challenges facing the Jewish state, Israel's leaders criticized Israeli emigrants, known in Hebrew as yordim, but no more, Gissin observed.

The attitude of Israel's establishment today is that Israeli citizens have a right to live wherever they want.

Israel, however, has a special responsibility to Israelis living abroad. "We give consular services to Israelis, and value judgments or emotions don't enter into it," Gissin said.

נעגעים לארץ ישראל

מאיר שלו עישה זאת שוב

הרומן ה-11 של מאיר שלו "הדבר היה ככה" הוא ספר מרגש, בפתוס ומעלה דמעה בו זמנית. לספר הספרי יש סיבה מובה: כך היתה מתחילה מכתבו המהללת מיניה כל סיפור וכל משפט שהיתה בו אלמנט של סיפור. אבל שמו האנגלי של הספר גלגל קצת יותר: "My Russian Grandmother and her American Vacuum Cleaner".

מאיר שלו מספר בגוף ראשון את הולדותיה של סבתו, אם אמו, ירדיכה את סיפור הנשפחה כולו, דרך עלילות שיוצא האצע שקיבלה סבתו מהגיס שלה באמריקה כתחנה בשנות השלושים של המאה שעברה.

ייתר משנה סיפור משפחתי נוגע ללב עד מאוד- והו ספורה של ארץ ישראל העיבודת של עמק יזרעאל, ארץ ישראל הישנה והטובה, והפרכים המביאות שהביאו את החקלאים קשי היום להראות באומה. בתיתי בסיפור אחת שיתאר אולי טוב יותר מאמרות את ליבו של הספר הגדול והמיוחד הזה:

"כבר שנים וסבתא הרבה על היחס המזרחב שבין החלוץ העברי ובין אחיהו, אבל אצל סבתא מונים היו הדברים מורכבים אף יותר. היא ידעה משהו שהבריטות נערה להתעלם ממנו: שהאדמה אינה רק נחלת אבותינו ובקרקע בחולה, ולא רק מנת לכף רגלם של יהודים נידחים ונרדפים. בגבעות מסיעות, לא נידחה כלל, אין היא אלא לכולך, אדמה העמק כבדה ושמנה ויש לה שני מצבר בשיבה: בקץ היא אבק ובחודף היא בץ. כלומר, גם כך וגם כך היא לכולך...."

קראתי את הספר בשמחה צרופה בעיברית מישראל לשיחתנו, ובפגם לפגם, כשעברה הדיוקן, השיחלתי שלא ובחין בימעותי (לא נעים). כפי שקראו בהמשך שמו הביקור הזה בימין נעגעים, ועל כן הספר המשלים הזה שיחת אותי טוב. כמו שגם ישחת אתכם. (אני מכיר אתכם). עשר בכולם קורן.

נעגעים לרדיו

כזרכי בקודש אני שוכר בטל התשיפה בן גדיון מסכנית קטנה ומתחיל להעביר תשות ברדיו כדי לשמוע מה קורה ואיך בשמעים הדברים. קדם כל אני נחים כל פעם מחדש בבמה תשות ערביות מקף החלל של ישראל. טוב, זה לא ממליא-ערים עם כשעים מלוים ערבים. ואז אני מתחיל לשים לב שגם בתחנת הישראלית מנגנים בעיקר שירים ערבים, אבל בעברית. קוראים להה "שירים יפ היכניים" ושרים אותם זמרים ישראלים. אין בדברי אלה שום ציניות או ביקורת, אלא רק ציין עובדה שכל ישראלי מוכן כיום לאשר, כי בגאווה ומי בבער:

כיום יש בישראל רוב מוחלט של הזמרים יצאני ארצות ערב הילידים, שבולל על מוזיקה יפ היכנית, ושעברים ארוך ארשטיין והה אלברשטיין אינם רלבנטים. כיום ממלאי האולמות ומוכרי התקליטים הם זמרי המוזיקה היפ היכנית. עד לפני כעשרים שנה שלם בתחנת הרדיו ממכז אשכנזי כזתני שמעע את שיחרום של השירים האלה לעובת שירי "ארץ ישראל הישנה הטובה". אבל לא עוד-כיום עם מסחרי הרדיו הצורך להוכיח למפרסמים את הפופולאריות של תחנת רדיו-אפילו גלי צה"ל האלימיסטי מעדר קצנרטים שלמים של מוזיקה יפ היכנית.

אוקיי, אני מבין את זה ומכבד את קהל המבן בקהל שדי-אבל אחרי תמימה ימים הרגשתי שאני הולך ומשתגע- זו לא ארץ ישראל שלי ואישי יכול להקשים בימים לפשלים ולפילם הפשטניות שמלווח אותם. בצר לי שיחפתי הבר או שניים הם חייבו אולי ברחמים וגילו לי שבימי ששי שבת מעדרת תחנת "רדיו ללא הפסקה" ב-103 FM ברציפות את השירים של פעם. ארי, חזה היה טוב, כל כך טוב. פתאום חזרתי הביתה. אז תרשמו לכם. אפשר לשמוע את התחנה הזאת גם כאן. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Planning under way for new humanitarian group

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — About 50 people attended a recent afternoon and evening of consultation on new ways for Canadian Jews to bring Jewish humanitarian relief and advocacy to the developing world regardless of race, religion or nationality.

Conference co-chairs Reisa Teitelbaum and Jack Jedwab, executive director of the Association for Canadian Studies, and others were brainstorming as part of the effort to create a Canadian entity modelled on the American Jewish World Service (AJWS).

The AJWS is an international organization that, its website states, fights poverty, hunger and disease in the developing world through on-the-ground and advocacy work, out of the Jewish imperative of tikkun olam (repairing the world).

"We have had a relationship [with AJWS] and been meeting for the last two years on this," Jedwab said at the opening session.

AJWS director of development, Riva Silverman, spoke, even though her organization has not yet explicitly endorsed the creation of a Canadian namesake.

"They are very enthusiastic, but have told me they are waiting for us to get more off the ground," Jedwab told The CJN.

At this point, the Canadian group is called the Canadian Jewish Association for International Development (CJ-AIDE), but it has also incorporated the name Canadian Jewish World Service.

Those supporting the endeavour include former Superior Court justice Hebert Marx, and Barbara Seal, national president of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University.

"I think this conference brought us closer to the goal," Marx told The CJN. "A lot of people from across Canada were there, and I think it's closer to fruition."

Among the participants were representatives of both Canadian and American Jewish groups with experience in charitable and humanitarian works.

They included UIA Federations Canada's CEO Linda Kislowicz, national March of the Living director Eli Rubenstein and national director of the Canada-Israel Experience Michael Soberman. Jedwab said, however, that it's not yet clear what role – if any – UIA Canada might play in regard to the new association.

Others included Will Recant, senior vice-president of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee; AIDS researcher Mark Wainberg; Toronto's Avrum Rosensweig, founder and president of Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, and Canadian Jewish youths who have been directly involved in relief efforts in such regions as India and Africa.

What makes the new Canadian entity unique, Jedwab said, is the fact that, like the AJWS, it would have people "on the ground" in developing nations doing projects and performing advocacy work as Jews.

Recipients of support in developing nations would be aware that it was coming from Jewish sources, he said.

"We are looking to create an organization that is branded Jewish."

While the terms of reference of Ve'ahavta sound similar to those of the new association, Jedwab said, Ve'ahavta is less national in scope and does not perform advocacy work.

According to material handed out at the conference, the AJWS is the "template" for the Canadian association. Among the Canadian priorities will be to mobilize strategic alliances, build future Canadian Jewish community leaders, strengthen and modernize Canada's Jewish community though new outreach, as well as advocate and educate.

But before work can begin on this ambitious agenda, much remains to be done. Jedwab said the next year will be spent developing a "blueprint" and targeting specific projects.

The group will also seek funding from individual and corporate sources, Marx said.

The association will need to identify at least two specific projects, have charitable status and be up and running for at least six months to be eligible for funding from Ottawa, Jedwab said.

At the consultation, Silverman recalled that about 25 years ago, a group of people "much like yourselves, [asked]: What are we North American Jews to do with all our power, security and wealth?"

The answer was AJWS, which now operates in 36 countries and has shown tremendous results in "giving people an opportunity to help themselves – one individual, one family, one community at a time," she said.

Jedwab said he is "most touched" by the heartfelt and obvious willingness of young people to be part of the Jewish obligation to serve humanity.

Cookbook offers recipes spiced with a pinch of humour

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Sisters Julie Albert and Lisa Gnat have teamed up to teach readers how to make family dinners easy and lighthearted.

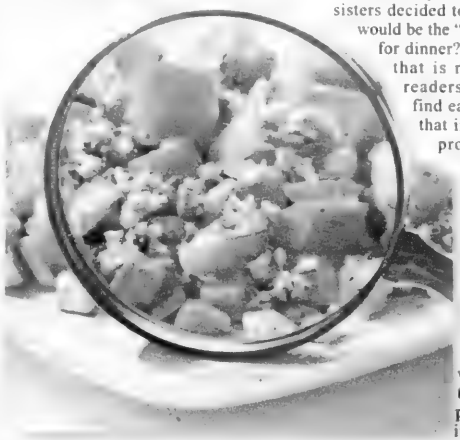
Authors of the self-published Bite Me, the sisters, daughters of philanthropist Larry Tanenbaum, have filled the cookbook with family friendly recipes and their own brand of humour.

Above the recipe for Traditional Chicken Soup and Matzah Balls is a telegram from 1907 that reads: "Sick of borscht. Stop. Freezing my matzah balls in Vladivostok. Stop. Hopping on a slow boat to Ellis Island. Stop. Heard they have nice soup on the lower East side. Stop."

Albert, the self-professed "big mouth sister" states on top of the Cranberry Orange Bread recipe that she and Lisa "[talk] at 8:32 every morning. If she's perky, I know she has started her day with a large slice of our citrus-flavoured cranberry-studded loaf. If she's grunting one-word answers, I know her husband took the last piece or her jeans shrunk in the dryer."

Speaking on the phone, hours before the pair embarked on a book tour to Edmonton, Calgary and Vancouver, Albert said they developed their love of food from their mother. "She cooked every night, and family dinners were a time for bonding. We waited until our father got home, and we all sat at the table as a family."

Gnat stayed in the kitchen while their mother cooked, Albert said, and later went on to study pastry arts at George Brown College.



"I feasted on noodles and butter when I left my parents' home, but I did want to re-create the family dinner."

With six preteens between them, the sisters decided to write a cookbook that would be the "go-to answer for 'what's for dinner?' We wanted something that is not fussy. We wanted readers to crack it open and find easy step-by-step recipes that include ingredients they probably already have at home."

They even took into account cooking mistakes. If the "soup is a salt mine, add a raw potato, peeled and cut into chunks, simmer for 15 minutes and remove potato.

"Until there is Viagra for limp vegetables, we will have to put them in the food processor and puree. Some suggestions include broccoli or cauliflower with cheddar and fresh herbs, carrots with cream and salt, or sweet potatoes with maple syrup and a touch of cinnamon."

The effort in putting the book together was evenly divided, Albert said. "Lisa did the recipe development and I did the writing. We both admired what the other was good at."

Albert said she was a good recipe tester because she is a layman cook. "I represented our readers. The book speaks to everyone."

She acknowledges that families have different schedules than they did a generation ago, and it's difficult to cook daily meals, "but that doesn't mean they don't want home cooking. Our goal is to make life easier."

They knew they were on the right track, she said, when Indigo asked for an exclusive deal to sell the book until after the holiday season, and named it as one of "Heather's Picks." "It's the first cookbook to be chosen for her table."

NUTTY BUTTERNUT SQUASH SOUP

2 tsp. vegetable oil
1 small yellow onion, diced
1 large garlic clove, minced
1 tbsp. mild curry powder
2 tsp. ground cumin
1/2 tsp. kosher salt
6 cups chicken broth
3 cups peeled and chopped butternut squash
1 cup peeled and shredded carrots
1 1/2 cups cooked white rice
1 cup frozen green peas, thawed
6 tbsp. smooth peanut butter
1/2 tsp. kosher salt

In a large soup pot, heat oil over medium-low heat. Add onion and garlic, cooking 4-5 minutes or until softened, stirring occasionally. Add curry powder, cumin and 1/2 tsp. salt. Cook for 1 minute, stirring constantly. Add chicken broth, butternut squash and carrots.

Over high heat, bring to a boil. Reduce heat to low, cover and simmer for 20 minutes until the squash has softened. Stir in rice, peas, peanut butter and 1/2 tsp. salt. Cook uncovered for 3 minutes until ingredients are blended. Serves 6.

OASTED-RAY EGETABLES-VAY WITH PECANS AND PARMESAN

(An encoded message for those of you who need to camouflage egetables-vay.)

2 lb. sweet potatoes, peeled and cubed
1 lb. carrots, peeled and cubed
1 lb. parsnips, peeled and cubed
3 tbsp. olive oil
1 tsp. kosher salt
1/4 tsp. freshly ground pepper

Pecan Parmesan Topping
1 cup chopped pecans
1/3 cup freshly grated Parmesan cheese
1/4 cup finely chopped fresh flat-leaf parsley
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
1 tbsp. lemon zest
1 tbsp. olive oil

Preheat oven to 425. Line a large baking sheet with aluminum foil. In a large bowl, toss sweet potatoes, carrots and parsnips with olive oil. Transfer to baking sheet and sprinkle with salt and pepper.

Roast vegetables, stirring often, for one hour or until tender. Transfer to a serving plate.

For the topping, in a small bowl, combine pecans, Parmesan, parsley, lemon juice, lemon zest and olive oil. Sprinkle over vegetables before serving.

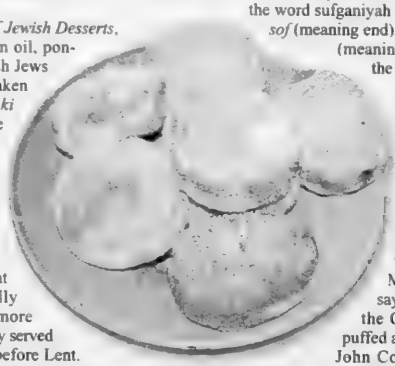
German Jews brought jelly doughnuts to Israel

By SYBIL KAPLAN
Special to The CJN

Two popular foods for Chanukah – sufganiyot, or jelly doughnuts, and ponchikot, which are ball-shaped or resemble a doughnut hole – come from Israel.

Gil Marks, in The World of Jewish Desserts, writes that doughnuts fried in oil, ponchikot, were adopted by Polish Jews for Chanukah. The name is taken from the Polish word, paczki (poonchkey), which led to the nickname, ponchiks, the Polish name for jelly doughnuts.



I noticed, in our Overland Park, Kan., newspaper one day, an ad for poonchkey, and a photograph of a plate of what looked to me to be sufganiyot. The ad explained that poonchkey are similar to jelly doughnuts, only larger and more rich tasting, and are traditionally served on Shrove Tuesday, the day before Lent. They were made to use up shortening and eggs, which were prohibited during Lent.

Sufganiyot have a more interesting history. In The Jewish Holiday Kitchen, Joan Nathan, an acquaintance of mine from our Jerusalem days and noted cookbook author and maven of American Jewish cooking, said she learned the origins of sufganiyot from Dov Noy, dean of Israel folklorists.

Noy relates a Bukhharian fable that says the first sufganiyah was a sweet given to Adam and Eve as compensation after their expulsion from the Garden of Eden. He says the word sufganiyah comes from the Hebrew word, sof (meaning end), gan (meaning garden) and Ya (meaning God). Thus the word means the end of God's garden.

According to Noy, this fable was created at the beginning of the 20th century, since sufganiyah is a new Hebrew word coined by pioneers.

Some say sufganiyot, which means sponge-like, are reminiscent of a sweet, spongy cookie popular along the Mediterranean since the time of the Maccabees. Hebrew dictionaries say the word actually comes from the Greek word sufgan, meaning puffed and fried.

John Cooper, author of Eat and Be Satisfied – A Social History of Jewish Food has another theory. He says Christians in Europe ate deep-fried pastries on New Year's Eve, and Christians in Berlin ate jelly doughnuts. From them, German Jews started eating apricot-filled doughnuts. When they immigrated to Palestine in the 1930s, they encouraged the population to eat the jelly doughnuts for Chanukah.

One of my favourite pieces of research includes the characteristics that sufganiyot are said to have: they are round like the wheel of fortune, they have to be looked at for what is inside not for their external qualities, and they cannot be enjoyed the same way twice.

PAREVE LOW-SUGAR PONCHIKOT

3/8 cup sugar
3/8 cup sugar substitute
2 eggs
1/4 cup non-dairy whipping cream
1-1/2 tsp. grated lemon peel
1 tbsp. vanilla extract
2-1/4 cups flour
1 tbsp. baking powder
2 tbsp. pareve unsalted margarine oil
confectioners' sugar

Combine sugar, sugar substitute, eggs, non-dairy whipping cream, lemon peel and vanilla in a bowl and blend well. In a mixer or food processor, combine flour, baking powder and margarine. Add to creamed mixture and form soft dough.

Heat oil in a pot. Drop dough by tablespoon into oil. Cook for 3 minutes or until brown then turn to brown other side. Drain on paper towels. Sprinkle confectioners' sugar on top before serving.

Recipes across the miles

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

I recently received an e-mail from Justice Robert Carr of Winnipeg, along with his recipe for Kezlikas. He wrote: "I have never been able to find another person who has even heard of the name of this recipe, let alone the recipe itself. This is my 92-year-old mom's very favourite food!" The recipe had been passed on to him by his late baba, Rasha Golden.

Since "kez" is the Yiddish word for cheese, I quickly determined that his grandmother's recipe was actually a variation of cheese muffins.

I wrote back: "I asked my 96-year-old mom, who is also from Winnipeg, about your Kezlika recipe, and she wasn't familiar with it at all. I thought some more and figured out that your baba probably smothered her cheese muffins with sour cream to cover any broken pieces, kind of like scalloped potatoes. What a wonderful way to hide the evidence! She must have influenced you in your career indirectly!"

Carr loves to cook and is the author of a recipe newsletter that he circulates to about 1,000 judges once a month. He kindly shared some of his favourite family recipes, and I'm delighted to share them with you, along with his "helpful" comments. His Kezlikas and Auntie Bessie's Roll are perfect for Chanukah, when dairy dishes are often served. Chicken Louis makes a delicious main dish to serve your guests with your favourite latkes. Read, laugh, cook and enjoy!

ROBERT CARR'S KEZLIKAS

Mix together, by hand, the following ingredients:

3 cups creamed cottage cheese (he uses 2%)
2-1/2 cups flour
1 tbsp. melted salted butter
pinch salt
3 tsp. baking powder
3 eggs, slightly beaten before adding
1 cup 2% or whole milk

Grease 18 muffin compartments very well with non-stick spray. (Don't use paper muffin liners.) Bake at 450 for 20 minutes (or bake at 425 on convection). They should be beginning to brown when done.

Let cool just long enough to be able to remove muffins – they stick if left too long, though as you will see from the next step, it matters not if they fall apart.

Recipes taste tested by lawyers and judges

In a large sprayed casserole dish (about 10 x 15 in.), combine muffins with 14% sour cream – at least 375 g (1-1/2 cups) of sour cream for 12 muffins. Bake at 350 for 45 minutes, gently turning muffins over a few times during the baking process. Smooth the top of the casserole with a spatula and don't stir during the last 20 minutes of baking for a more attractive presentation. Spread with another cupful (or so) of sour cream 5 minutes before baking is complete. Yield: 15 servings.

ROBERT CARR'S CHICKEN LOUIS

"This chicken was my late Uncle Richard Miles' favourite. It's very good left over, and it freezes well (if left in a cold place)!"

8 chicken thighs and a few drumsticks, bone left in on the thighs, some skin on both cut off (preferably air-chilled) chicken coating mix
9 oz. jar pineapple jam
1/4 cup white horseradish
1/4 cup prepared mustard
1/4 tsp. ground ginger or 2 tsp. freshly grated (I use the fresh stuff, but I am the author of a recipe newsletter!)

Coat chicken pieces with coating mix and arrange in a single layer on a greased baking sheet. Bake uncovered in a preheated 350-degree oven for 30 minutes.

While chicken is cooking, turn on music, then bring the next 4 ingredients to a boil (jam, horseradish, mustard and ginger). Set aside on a surface that will not catch fire, for the bottom of the pot will likely be very hot, having just been on a very hot element!

After chicken has cooked for 30 minutes, coat it with some of the sauce and put it back in the oven for 10 minutes. Remove from oven, using oven mitts because the dish could be very hot having just been in the oven for another 30 minutes. Add 1/4 cup water to remaining sauce. Baste the Chicken Louis and cook for a further 10 minutes, still uncovered.

Today's latkes have a flip side!

By RANDY FINGRUT
Special to The CJN

Ever since oil burned in the Temple for eight days, foods fried in oil have been our customary fare to represent the miracle of Chanukah. However, the traditional potato latke that we have enjoyed for many years has evolved over time.

The ordinary potato we rely on as a staple was not introduced into Europe until after the 16th century. Before this time, Chanukah was celebrated by preparing latke patties, often made from cheese, dried fruits, nuts, grains or lentils. These latkes were flattened into pancakes, fried in goose fat, (a favourite at the time), and were served up hot and crispy.

Now, we are capable of expanding the scope of latke possibilities, moving toward ideas that are new and exciting, and possibly even a little healthier than ever before. These trendy latkes are designed with out of the ordinary ingredients. They can be fried in oil in a traditional manner, or baked in the oven with a touch of oil. This Chanukah, we leap not only backward in time, but also forward to meet latkes with a flip side. Try these latkes – your family will flip over them.

BLACK BEAN LATKES WITH APPLE/AVOCADO GUACAMOLE

Latkes

2 cans black beans – 1 can drained but not rinsed, 1 can drained and rinsed
2 eggs, beaten
2 tbsp. chopped fresh cilantro
1 tbsp. ground cumin
1/4 tsp. hot chili sauce
1 tsp. fresh lime juice
1 tsp. salt
1/2 cup all purpose flour
2 tbsp. canola oil
additional oil if necessary

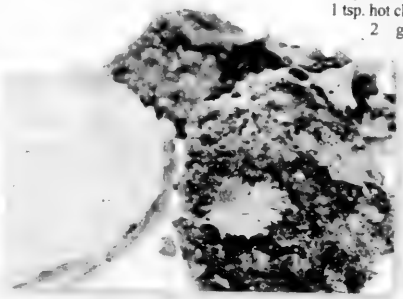
In a food processor, combine the drained but not rinsed beans, eggs, cilantro, cumin, hot chili sauce, lime juice and salt. Mix in flour. Add the rinsed beans, keeping beans whole. Form small patties and flatten with a fork.

Option A

Heat oil in a large non-stick pan. Working in batches, fry latkes until firm and crisp, about 3 minutes per side. Drain on paper towels. Repeat, adding additional oil if necessary.

Option B

Line a baking sheet with parchment paper that has been sprayed with canola oil. Position latkes one inch apart. Bake in a 350 oven for 10 minutes. May be made ahead and reheated



Apple/Avocado Guacamole

2 ripe avocados
1 tbsp. fresh lime juice
1 tbsp. fresh chopped cilantro
1/2 tsp. salt
2 cloves garlic, minced
1/4 tsp. hot chili sauce
1 small firm apple

Core and peel apple and cut into small dice. In a covered dish, microwave diced apple on high for 3 minutes, cool.

In a medium bowl, mash avocados, with lime juice. Add cilantro, salt, garlic and hot chili sauce. Combine cooked apple into avocado mixture. Cover and refrigerate for a minimum of 30 minutes before serving.

Prior to serving, dollop a spoonful of guacamole on each latke.

PAN-ASIAN LATKES WITH SESAME DIPPING SAUCE

Pan-Asian Latkes

4 large potatoes, washed but not peeled
1/4 cup all purpose flour
2 eggs, beaten
1 1/2 tsp. sesame oil
2 tbsp. soy sauce
2 tsp. fresh grated ginger
1 tsp. hot chili sauce
2 green onions chopped
2 tbsp. toasted sesame seeds
1/4 cup unsalted cashews, coarsely chopped
2 tbsp. canola
additional oil if necessary

Grate potatoes and squeeze out as much liquid as possible. Combine grated potatoes with the flour, eggs, sesame oil, soy sauce, ginger, hot chili sauce, green onions, sesame seeds and cashews.

Option A

Heat oil in a large non-stick pan. Working in batches, spoon 1/4 cup of mixture into pan about four at a time, and flatten with a fork. Fry, turning as needed, until golden, about 8-10 minutes per side. Drain on paper towels. Repeat, adding additional oil if necessary.

Option B

Line a baking sheet with parchment paper that has been sprayed with canola oil. Spoon 1/4 cup of latke mixture 2-3 inches apart. Flatten with a fork. Bake in a 350-degree oven for 10-12 minutes, turn and bake 10-12 more minutes or until golden on each side. May be made ahead and reheated.

Sesame Dipping Sauce

Combine:
1 clove minced garlic
1/4 cup soy sauce
1/4 cup rice vinegar
1 tsp. sesame oil
1 tsp. honey
1 green onion chopped
2 tsp. toasted sesame seeds

POLENTA LATKES

1/2 cup extra virgin olive oil
additional oil if necessary
1 small onion, finely chopped
1/4 red pepper, chopped
1/4 green pepper, chopped
2 cloves garlic, minced
4 1/2 cups vegetable stock or water
1 1/2 cups polenta (cornmeal)
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper

Heat 1 tbsp. of the oil in a large pot on medium high heat. Add onion and red and green peppers, sauté until soft, add garlic. Add 3 cups of the stock and bring to a boil.

In a bowl, mix the polenta with the remaining 1-1/2 cups of stock. Season with salt and pepper. Slowly add polenta mixture into boiling stock. It will become very thick. Reduce heat to medium and whisk for 5 minutes.

Spoon mixture onto a large parchment-covered baking sheet. Spread mixture evenly and cover. Refrigerate until cold. Cut out circles using a 2-1/2-3-in. round cookie cutter or drinking glass.

Option A

Heat 2 tbsp. of oil in a large non-stick pan. Fry latkes, turning as needed, until golden, about 8 minutes per side. Drain on paper towels. Repeat, adding additional oil if necessary.

Option B

Line a baking sheet with parchment paper that has been sprayed with olive oil. Position patties one inch apart. Bake in a 350-degree oven for 20 -25 minutes, until golden.

May be made ahead and reheated.

Auntie Bessie's favourite recipes

Cooking time varies with size of chicken pieces and how close they are to one another. If they are too close, mind you, they could pinch one another, as my kids used to do when I positioned them too close together in the back seat of a small car! Makes 4 to 6 servings.

AUNTIE BESSIE'S ROLL

My father's shvester

"The only catch with my Auntie Bessie's recipe is that you really need a long loaf pan or 2 small foil ones, not the one you usually use, for example, when making banana bread. Pick one up at a kitchen store and you'll not regret it. This recipe is pathetically simple, exceptionally low in fat as you can see, and is a huge hit with company."

1/2 cup butter
3/4 cup sugar
2 eggs
2-1/2 cups flour
pinch salt
2 heaping tsp. baking powder
1 cup 2% milk
1 tsp. vanilla
1 tbsp. cinnamon
1-1/2 cups chocolate chips

Cream the butter, sugar and eggs in an electric mixer. Add all the remaining ingredients except the chocolate chips, gradually, alternating dry and wet ingredients. Then add chocolate chips, mixing by hand.

Grease or spray and lightly flour the long pan. Bake at 350 for 1 hour. Let cool for 20 minutes, then gently invert over a rack. (I use the one from my broiler to allow both bottom and top to cool.) Yield: 12 to 15 servings.

Planning ahead eases burden in event of serious illness

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Howard Jachter – one of five panelists at a recent program called "When Serious Illness Strikes" – said its title really should have been "Before Illness Strikes."

The importance of planning ahead was underscored repeatedly by the two rabbis, two physicians and a lawyer who spoke at the event.

A program of Torah in Motion and the Orthodox Union's department of community services, the panel discussion took place at Congregation B'nai Torah on Nov. 29.

Joining Rabbi Jachter, the dayan of the Elizabeth, N.J. beit din, were Dr. Jonathan Abrams of the Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital; Dr. Hy Dwosh, clinical director of York Central Hospital's intensive care unit from 2002 until June 2009; Toronto lawyer Rachel Blumenfeld; and Rabbi Ronald Weiss, director of chaplaincy services at Jewish Family and Child.

Frank Buchweitz, the OU's national director of community services and special projects, moderated the event, which the OU has brought to communities throughout the United States.

For Abrams, one of the main issues in palliative care is determining when to decide against using "aggressive" measures like cardiopulmonary resuscitation or a respirator.

"I think in real life, these situations are highly variable, and there are many nuances, Abrams said. "There's no hard and fast rule."

As an aside, he noted that even when patients are receiving palliative care, they "still deserve and should get appropriate care if facing something that can be treated."

Abrams said that talking about the issues may be painful, but is often a relief.

"[Patients] telling their loved ones what they want makes it easier for their family."

Dwosh said he tries to take a collaborative approach to decision-making.

"The struggle we have is at what point does the burden of suffering from the intervention become too great for a person to bear, at the expense of comfort. It's not an easy decision for patients and families. It's also not easy for physicians," he said.

"Rarely, situations of conflict do arise. It's not surprising when you think of the emotions at play. One of the pitfalls is if you go down the path of an adversarial approach – 'I'm the doctor and I say this...' – you get entrenched in a polarization of views."

He said he believes it is a duty of the physician to make sure that families are aware of chaplaincy, social work and rabbinic support.

Rabbi Jachter spoke of his own experience managing the care of his mother during her final illness in the mid-1990s.

He noted that his mother had told her family her wishes "in easy terms" before she became ill. "Don't let me lie and suffer," she instructed.

She also signed a health care proxy, indicating who was to make decisions if she became unable to do so. "This way, there's not an argument among family about who's going to be making a decision," Rabbi Jachter said.

Earlier this year, he noted, the OU and the Rabbinical Council of America issued a halachic health care proxy form, which is downloadable online at rabbis.org.

As well, Rabbi Jachter suggested that people write "an informal and non-binding letter to family, rabbi and friends, explaining one's wishes in very general terms."

He said it's important "not to blur the role of rabbis and doctors," even in cases where a doctor has rabbinic ordination or a rabbi is also a doctor.

Buchweitz added that it is important to ensure that a designated rabbi agrees to be named as a consultant.

Blumenfeld said that in Ontario there are two types of power of attorney – one for property, and one for personal care.

The first comes into effect immediately, although it is intended for use only when the person issuing it becomes incapacitated, she said. Often, lawyers will keep it until that time, as a safeguard, she added.

Blumenfeld noted that different people can be appointed as personal care proxy and proxy for property. "However, they should be able to get along. They will have to work together. There may have to be decisions regarding assets that will directly affect the care the person is going to be able to receive."

Proxies for personal care can include instructions regarding decisions being made in accordance with Jewish law, and can name a religious authority to help make those sorts of decisions, Blumenfeld said.

Rabbi Weiss said that he encourages family members to go to their rabbis for halachic decisions. The role of chaplaincy, he clarified, is "to bridge the clash of culture between religious values and medical perspectives" as well as to help patients, family members and, often, medical staff in dealing with the trauma that accompanies serious illness.

Swedish proposal called 'a serious threat'

The proposal reportedly does not explicitly identify western Jerusalem as the capital of Israel.

"The Europeans should not dictate the outcome of negotiations in advance," Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon said Sunday evening. "This declaration is a dangerous initiative that could hurt efforts to resume negotiations between the parties and will harden the Palestinian position.

Ayalon added: "Importantly, this initiative contravenes the principles of the international community and the decisions of the Quartet [the United States, Russia, the United Nations and the European Union], whereby the parties reach agreement by direct talks."

Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat, in a letter sent Monday to Baroness Ashton of Upholland, EU High Representative for foreign affairs, called the Swedish proposal "a serious threat not just to the future of the city of Jerusalem, but also to the future role of the entire European Union in the peace process. By attempting to dictate the outcome of negotiations now, the Swedish delegation will strip the European Union of its right to serve as an honest mediator."

"Division focuses on differences rather than the common denominator that unites people of all faiths. We must not divide the heart and soul of the Jewish People.

"Despite the many conquerors of Jerusalem throughout history," Barkat wrote, "the Jewish people constantly remain the only people to claim Jerusalem as their capital for thousands of years. We must not disrupt the freedom to practise one's religion throughout Jerusalem, which is greater today under the flag of Israel than it has been for 2,000 years, and which we intend to uphold."

As part of the campaign to prevent the adoption of the Swedish initiative, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu phoned several European leaders last week, including German Chancellor Angela Merkel and Spanish Prime Minister Jose Luis Zapatero, asking them to oppose the plan and to pressure the PA to renew negotiations with Israel.

Opposition leader Tzipi Livni also urged Sweden's foreign minister, Carl Bildt, to abandon the EU plan to issue an official call for the division of Jerusalem between Israel and the Palestinians.

"I wish to convey my deep concern regarding what appears to be an attempt to prejudge the outcome of issues reserved for permanent status negotiations," Livni, a former foreign minister, wrote to Bildt.

Livni sent the letter in response to Ha'aretz's report that EU foreign ministers were expected to call this week for Jerusalem to be divided, in order to serve as the capitals of both Israel and a future Palestinian state.

In an attempt to counter Israeli pressure, PA Prime Minister Salam Fayyad last week convened a group of European diplomats to ask them to support the Swedish proposal.

Sweden's initiative calls for the division of Jerusalem and the recognition of east Jerusalem as the capital of Palestine. The draft proposal also reportedly hints that the European Union would recognize a unilateral Palestinian declaration of independence.

According to senior officials in Jerusalem as well as European diplomats, the main areas of disagreement between Israel and the EU were the status of Jerusalem, possible EU recognition of a Palestinian state and the extent of support by Israel's government of the 10-month construction moratorium in West Bank settlements.

Sweden, with the support of Britain, Ireland, Belgium and a number of other countries, continued to promote its original formulation of the proposal calling for east Jerusalem to be the capital of the Palestinian state.

France, however, pushed for a formulation that conforms to a speech that President Nicolas Sarkozy made to the Knesset two years ago. Sarkozy said that Jerusalem would be the capital of both countries and did not mention a division of the city into east and west Jerusalem. The French are also trying to promote a more definitive declaration of support for the construction freeze.

When Netanyahu spoke to Zapatero, whose country will take over the rotating presidency of the EU from Sweden next month, he told the Spanish prime minister that the EU should not determine the outcome of the negotiations on a final status agreement between Israel and the PA. Netanyahu gave a similar message to Merkel.

Israeli national security adviser Uzi Arad phoned his French counterpart, Jean-David Levitte, and apparently also called British foreign policy adviser Simon McDonald. During a meeting last week in Athens with the foreign ministers of Spain, Poland, Hungary and the Czech Republic, Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman said he hoped the wording of the resolution would be changed.

In meetings in Ramallah and east Jerusalem, Fayyad asked European diplomats to support the Swedish resolution in its present form.

World Bank offers PA $64 million to build state institutions

JTA

JERUSALEM — The World Bank has said it will give the Palestinian Authority $64 million (US) to build institutions in preparation for it to become a state in two years.

The gift was announced Sunday during a high-level World Bank Group delegation fact-finding mission to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

A day earlier, the mission had conducted site visits to the World Bank-supported development projects, including private enterprises, in the West Bank cities of Hebron and Bethlehem.

The delegation met in Ramallah with Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Salam Fayyad and other Palestinian officials on Sunday, and attended the launch of the multi-donor-funded Municipal Development Program. A meeting also was scheduled with Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon.

"We are here primarily to discuss the Palestinian Authority's efforts to improve public financial management and strengthen its fiscal position, two fundamental pillars of Prime Minister Fayyad's plan for the establishment of a Palestinian state," said World Bank vice-president Shamshad Akhtar, a leader of the delegation.

"Our discussions with the government of Israel will focus on improvement of access to Gaza as a precondition for recovery and reconstruction," Akhtar said. "Many donors have emphasized to us that they are ready to significantly expand operations in Gaza if current access problems are resolved."

EU report slams Israeli policy in east Jerusalem

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — A classified report drafted by European consuls in east Jerusalem and Ramallah slams Israeli policy in east Jerusalem and recommends that the European Union take steps to strengthen the Palestinian Authority's status in the city.

It also advises taking various measures to protest Israeli policy in the city, as well as sanctions against people and groups involved in "settlement activity" in and around it.

The report, a copy of which was obtained by Ha'aretz, is updated annually by EU representatives to the PA. This year's report was completed on Nov. 23 and presented to EU institutions in Brussels a few days ago.

Due to the sensitivity of the document, the EU has never before published it, and in previous years, Israel pressed the EU hard not to do so, for fear the publication would further undermine the European public's already negative view of Israel.

Senior Foreign Ministry officials said this year's report "left a harsh impression" in Brussels and helped Sweden promote its plan to have the EU formally recognize east Jerusalem as the capital of a Palestinian state.

The report accused both the Israeli government and the Jerusalem municipality of working deliberately to alter the city's demographic balance and sever east Jerusalem from the West Bank. It said that both bodies assist right-wing organizations, such as Ateret Cohanim and Elad, in their efforts to implement this "strategic vision," especially around the Holy Basin area. These organizations buy houses in Arab neighbourhoods, and make "attempts to implant further Jewish settlements into the heart of the Muslim Quarter."

The municipality, the report continued, discriminates against the city's Arab residents with regard to building permits, health services, education, sanitation and more.

"During the past years, Palestinians have received fewer than 200 building permits per year," it said. "Based on the population growth, permits for another 1,500 housing units annually would be necessary to cover the housing needs." For instance, the EU report noted, the village of Silwan has received only 20 building permits since 1967.

Though 35 per cent of Jerusalem residents are Arab, only five to 10 per cent of the city's budget goes to Arab neighbourhoods, it continued. As a result, these areas present "a sharp contrast" to "west Jerusalem neighbourhoods and east Jerusalem settlements where Israelis live."

A significant portion of the report deals with archeological excavations in Jerusalem, especially near the Temple Mount. These digs, it charged, focus mainly on Jewish history.

"Archeology in this case has become an ideologically motivated tool of national and religious struggle carried out in a manner that modifies the identity and character of the city and threatens to undermine its stability," the report said.

On another issue, it stated: "The expansion of Israeli settlements has sparked a trend of settler violence against the Palestinian population in east Jerusalem. Such criminal actions have been witnessed by Israeli police but are not met with adequate intervention."

Israel's closure of Palestine Liberation Organization and PA institutions in the city was also blasted in the report: "The general sense of neglect felt by many east Jerusalemites and the absence of Palestinian state-sponsored institutions and secular organizations are paving the way for Islamic religious organizations to expand their influence."

The European consuls proposed several measures to strengthen the PA presence in the eastern part of the city and pressure Israel to stop harming the Arab population. They include the following.

• Ensure EU presence at Israeli court cases on house demolitions or evictions of Palestinian families and when there is a risk of demolition or eviction of Palestinian families.

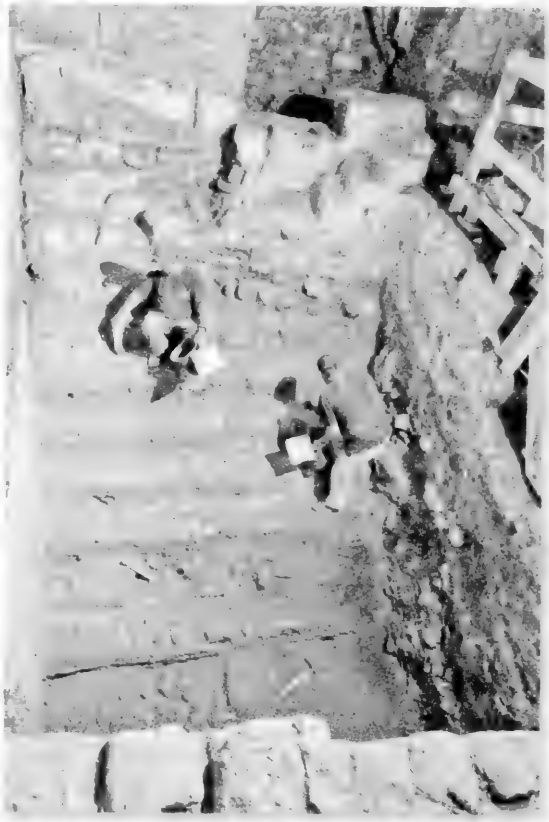
• EU celebrations, commemorations and national or Europe day events to be held in east Jerusalem.

• EU missions with offices or residences in east Jerusalem to regularly host Palestinian officials for dinners with senior EU visitors.

• Avoid having Israeli security accompany high-ranking officials from member states when visiting the Old City or east Jerusalem.

• Refraining from meeting Israeli officials in their east Jerusalem offices.

• Information sharing on violent settlers in east Jerusalem to assess whether to grant entry to the EU.



Israeli archeologists, above, recently uncovered a large mikvah (ritual bath) adjacent to the Temple Mount. Scholars speculate it was used by the countless pilgrims who came to the Temple in Jerusalem. Above left, is a sandal found by archeologists in recent excavations south of the Old City. The excavations that yielded these findings were criticized by the European consuls in their annual report on Jerusalem. [Israel Sun photos]

Orthodox boxer Salita falls in title bout

JTA

LONDON — American Jewish boxer Dmitriy Salita was stopped 1:16 into his World Boxing Association light-welterweight championship bout.

Champion Amir Khan, a Muslim of Pakistani descent, floored the unbeaten Salita twice Saturday night before the referee halted the match in Newcastle, England. Salita, who sported a Star of David on his trunks, also took a standing-eight count.

Salita, an Orthodox Jew, studies at a Chabad yeshiva in Brooklyn, N.Y.

Salita, 27, came in as a heavy underdog despite a 30-0-1 record and being the No. 1 contender for the crown. He was knocked down 10 seconds into the fight, took the eight count after another shot, then was sent to the canvas again before referee Luis Pabon of Puerto Rico stepped in after 76 seconds.

Islamic Movement gathers steam in Israel

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

UMM AL-FAHM, Israel — It's time for noon prayers in this Israeli Arab city, and a jumble of sneakers piles up outside the doors of a mosque on the top floor of a private high school for the sciences.

Inside, the boys, led in prayer by a math teacher, stand in two rows on a green and beige carpet, and then kneel in unison. The $5.8-million tab to construct the high school, considered one of the top Arab schools in Israel with its state-of-the art physics and chemistry labs, was picked up by the Israeli Islamic Movement.

Such support – helping fund community needs not being met by the Israeli government – is one way the movement is gaining power and influence among Israel's 1.2 million Arabs.

"This vacuum has opened the door for the Islamic Movement to get in and provide alternative services," said Yousef Jabareen, a resident of Umm al-Fahm and director of Dirasat, a non-profit that advocates for socio-economic and political equality for Israel's Arab citizens.

The influence of the movement – particularly its northern branch, which preaches adherence to a devout form of Islam and a code of social isolation from Israel at large – can be seen in the shift toward increased religious observance among some of Israel's Arab citizens, the majority of whom are Muslim.

Critics say the movement's more extreme elements preach a form of nationalism that is actively anti-Israeli and is radicalizing Israel's Arab citizens. Its social service tactics have been compared to the work of Hamas, which similarly built a base of support among ordinary Palestinians by providing social services not offered by the Fatah-dominated Palestinian Authority.

With its power base in Umm al-Fahm, one of Israel's largest Arab towns, the Israeli Islamic Movement is drawing support with the message that pride in Islamic roots can overcome the feelings of second-class citizenship to which Arab citizens often feel relegated in the Jewish state.

The movement is divided into two branches: the more radical northern branch, which eschews the Israeli political process and calls on followers to abstain from voting in national Israeli elections, and the more moderate southern branch, which is represented in Israel's Knesset.

Sheik Ibrahim Sansur, a Knesset member who leads the movement's southern branch, told JTA that the Islamic Movement is united by the goal "to crystallize the religious and national identity of the Arab minority inside Israel."

Representatives of the northern branch refused JTA's requests for interviews. But Sheik Ra'ad Salah, a key leader of the branch and the former mayor of Umm al-Fahm, made headlines during the Jewish High Holidays this year when he called on supporters to "liberate" the Al-Aqsa mosque in Jerusalem "with blood and fire," touching off days of clashes between police and Arab rioters.

Umm al-Fahm is a visible example of the movement's success. Its hilly landscape is dotted with the rounded domes of mosques built by the movement, as well as dozens of other movement-funded projects, including women's education centres, a college for the study of Islamic law and Arabic language, and even a hospital under construction. A growing number – perhaps a majority – of women and girls wear headscarves, and men sport thick beards.

The Islamic Movement started to take off here following the 1967 Six-Day War. It was then that Israel's Arab citizens could re-establish ties with their Palestinian brethren in the West Bank and Gaza Strip that had been cut off since the 1948 war of Israeli independence. Many Arab Israelis attended Islamic colleges in the West Bank and Gaza, sparking a return to devout observance for some inside Israel. The movement was strengthened by the example of the Islamic revolution in Iran in 1979.

Salah has become the face of the movement's more controversial side. A product of the post-1967 Islamic awakening in Israel, Salah returned from his religious studies in Hebron and Nablus as a leader of the movement. He has been accused of raising millions of dollars for Hamas, a charge he denies.

Yitzhak Reiter, a professor of political science at the Hebrew University and Ashkelon Academic College, says Salah's broader goal is to connect Israel's Muslims to the larger Islamic world and make Jerusalem the future seat of an Islamic caliphate.

Salah preaches that Israel's archeological activities near the Temple Mount are part of a secret Jewish plan to destabilize the Al-Aqsa Mosque, provoke its collapse and pave the way for the construction of the Jewish holy temple. Such charges are dismissed as fantasy and incitement by Israeli authorities.

Nohad Ali, a sociologist at Haifa University and an expert on the Islamic Movement, says Salah and his followers nevertheless believe such conspiracies to be true. The fears have been heightened by the desire of some Israelis to visit the Temple Mount and by messianic talk by a few radicals who talk of rebuilding the Holy Temple, Ali said.

Though it's not in the interests of the movement to rush headlong into confrontation with Israel, Ali said, the movement continues to keep the issue a central one in the community, organizing buses daily to the Temple Mount compound from Arab towns and villages throughout the country.

In Umm al-Fahm, the recent tensions in Jerusalem feel remote, but social problems are felt acutely. The city has one of the highest unemployment rates in the country.

Ahmad Kabaha, the math teacher who leads students in prayer, says he admires the movement for its grassroots work.

"People tend to think about them in a political way," Kabaha said, "but I see their importance in how it helps with problems within our society, in doing good deeds, in helping the poor."

Israel Briefs

Lebanon fires at Israeli planes

The Lebanese army fired on at least four Israel Air Force planes flying over southern Lebanon last week. Lebanese news media reported that the anti-aircraft fire forced the Israeli planes to return to Israel. In addition, the Lebanese government agreed to allow the terrorist organization Hezbollah to keep its weapons, in violation of the United Nations resolution that ended the 2006 Second Lebanon War. Hezbollah reportedly has thousands of rockets and explosives hidden in southern Lebanon.

Violence needed: Nasrallah

Presenting his new political platform, Hezbollah's leader said armed struggle is the only way to get back land captured by Israel. "Israel represents a constant threat and an impending danger to Lebanon," Hezbollah Secretary General Hassan Nasrallah said last week in a speech filmed by closed-circuit cameras and broadcast to reporters. Nasrallah also took a hard line against the United States, saying its "unlimited support to Israel… places the American administration in the position of the enemy of our nation and our peoples." Nasrallah said the Iran- and Syria-backed Hezbollah will continue to arm itself to meet threats from Israel with force. The 2006 United Nations resolution that ended the Second Lebanon War bans arms in south Lebanon. "The resistance has managed to achieve a huge victory over the Zionist entity, provide the homeland with protection, and liberation of the remainder of its land," he said. "This function is a lasting necessity before Israel's expansionist threats and ambitions, as well as the lack of a strong government in Lebanon."

Reality series at Shaare Zedek

Steven Spielberg and the producer of Everybody Loves Raymond are producing a reality television series set at Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Hospital. The Jerusalem Post reported that Raymond producer Phil Rosenthal was in Israel last week to check out Shaare Zedek and hold discussions with the Israeli producers of the show, which is scheduled to air on the Sundance Channel in the United States in 2011. A longtime backer of Shaare Zedek, Rosenthal said the series would revolved around bringing a small group of American doctors to work alongside Israeli doctors, learning about Israel's specialty in emergency treatment and the interplay between Jews, Christians and Muslims at the hospital.

Jews, Arabs clash in Jerusalem

Jews and Arabs clashed over a house in an eastern Jerusalem neighborhood. The confrontation occurred last Tuesday in Sheik Jarrah, north of the Old City, when Jews tried to move into a home in the Arab area after a court order allowed them to take over the property. The Supreme Court said the home was "owned by Jews." Police and private security officers escorted the new Jewish residents to the home. Palestinians reportedly attacked the new residents. A Jewish man was taken to a hospital after being hit over the head with a pipe. Two Jews, two non-Israeli left-wing activists and an Arab resident were arrested in the violence.

Army to fight Facebook enemies

The Israel Defence Forces will draft recruits to fight the enemy on Facebook and Twitter. The IDF is set to begin drafting computer experts in order to start a new media department unit, an army spokesperson said at the Eilat Journalists Conference. The new unit would be part of the Army Spokesman's Office. The IDF posted videos on YouTube showing attacks on Gaza targets during the Gaza war last winter to show how careful the IDF is to avoid harming civilians. The program to face hostile entities on the Web is set to be operational in a few months, IDF spokesman Brig.-Gen. Avi Benayahu said.

Toronto philanthropist opens Jerusalem's Aish HaTorah centre

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — The new Aish HaTorah World Center takes up some 40 per cent of the real estate adjacent the Western Wall and Temple Mount.

It bears the name the "Dan Family Building of Canada," which was in the spotlight last Thursday night when hundreds of people gathered at the Wall Plaza for the building's official inauguration.

The crowd cheered as the boys' Shira Hadasha choir sang, torches were lit on the rooftop of the new building, and video footage of Aish HaTorah's late founder, Rabbi Noach Weinberg, flashed across the limestone face of the new structure.

The ceremony was attended by chief rabbi of Israel, Yona Metzger, and rabbi of the Kotel, Shmuel Rabinovitz, along with 50 donors from North America, who came as part of a weeklong DedicAISHion mission, among them Canadians David Bronfman, Harvey Hecker, Eli Grossman, Andrea and Stuart Hytman, and Leslie and Anna Dan, the Toronto family who contributed the lion's share of funding to the new facility.

"It is my hope that this building will have a major impact upon the future of the Jewish people," said Leslie Dan, founder of the Canadian generic drug manufacturer, Novopharm Ltd., which was sold to Teva Pharmaceutical Industries Ltd. in 2000, making Dan the Israeli pharmaceutical conglomerate's largest private stockholder.

"Aish HaTorah's main concern is to help bring the Jewish people back to Judaism by showing them the beauty and love that emanates from the Jewish religion. I am very glad that I am in a position to support that."

The biggest problem facing the Jewish Diaspora is assimilation, Dan said. "The Jewish people are disappearing. In the long-term, given two-three-four generations, intermarriage could be just as devastating to the Jewish people as the Holocaust. It has been said that a Jew is not defined as he who is Jewish today, but by he whose grandchildren are Jewish."

The answer, said Dan, lies in rekindling Jews' ties to Judaism. "Unless we take steps and make efforts to do this, it's not going to happen. Aish HaTorah is taking those steps."

Dan, who dedicated the first Aish HaTorah building across from the Western Wall 14 years ago, affixed the mezuzah onto the new building's main entrance. The new building was converted from a two-storey, 7,000-square-foot structure built during the Ottoman era – used in the 19th century by an American minister to proselytize to Jews – into an eight-storey 55,000-square-foot space that will serve as the organization's headquarters.

The top floors of the $20-million (US) edifice will be used for educational programming, while the lower two floors are home to the "Exploratorium," a unique interactive museum of Jewish history that includes the Rav Noach Weinberg Tribute Wall, as well as the Kirk Douglas Theater, donated by the Hollywood actor, to be used for events that teach Jews about their heritage and connection to Jerusalem. On the rooftop, sits the largest model of the Temple ever built.

"This building is a testament to the recognition Aish HaTorah has received for the work that we're doing, which is reaching out to the entire Jewish world," said Rabbi Nechemia Coopersmith, editor-in-chief of Aish.com, one of the largest Jewish-content websites. "We are trying to reach all Jews and wake them up to the meaning and beauty of their heritage, and what better spot to do this than across from the Western Wall."

Rabbi Coopersmith played a significant role in designing the Rav Weinberg Tribute Wall, a state-of-the-art interactive touch-screen controlled installation. "Through our website and all of our programs, we are reaching hundreds of thousands of Jews every year, and this building will be a tremendous tool to reach way more."

The Aish HaTorah building

In his speech, Chief Rabbi Metzger highlighted Aish HaTorah's unique outreach approach. "There's a big difference between Aish HaTorah yeshivas and other kinds of yeshivas," he said. "[Rabbi] Weinberg created this yeshiva to look after boys and girls who came from all over the world... He didn't wait, as most heads of yeshivas waited, for them to come and learn at his yeshiva. He went outside and called them in for a lunch, for a dinner, and then he began to teach them the Torah."

The organization's proactive mandate has resulted in quick expansion. What began as a Jerusalem yeshiva consisting of one rabbi and five students has over the last 35 years grown into an international movement spanning five continents, with 37 branches, and an online following of 750,000, with three million hits a month.

Toronto was the second international city to open an Aish HaTorah satellite, the Village Shul at Bathurst Street and Eglinton Avenue West, in 1981 (after St. Louis, Mo.). Since then, two other Aish HaTorah branches have opened, one in Thornhill, Ont., and the other on the University of Toronto campus.

"Toronto has always been on the forefront of Jewry worldwide. Toronto [Jews] have a connection to Judaism that is stronger, and different," said Harvey Hecker, former international chairman of Laventhal and Horwath, one of the world's largest accounting firms. Hecker retired two years ago from his post as international president of Aish HaTorah, after 27 years of involvement with the organization in Toronto.

"We live in Toronto and think that the rest of the world is like Toronto, but Toronto is special," he said. "Its [Jewish] leadership and its ability to keep people connected, is incredible."

Rabbi Shmuel Veffer, who made aliyah to Beit Shemesh from Toronto with his wife, Chana, in 1983, after helping to establish the Village Shul, concurs. "There is something very special about Canadian Jews and their connection with Israel," he said. "Part of that has to do with the fact that we are one generation less assimilated [than a lot of Jews in the United States].

"A lot of people came to Canada only after the Holocaust, and so the generation that came after them is much more connected to Judaism, Jewish culture and Israel. I think that's why you see so many Canadians connected with projects in Israel, and with Aish HaTorah, specifically."

Canadians have become a very strong force in supporting Aish HaTorah," Dan said. "We are very dedicated to the dreams and the objectives of Rav Weinberg... to bring the Jewish people back to Judaism."

Israelis want Schalit home despite costs

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

In promos for an upcoming Israeli television special on Gilad Schalit's family, the captive soldier's parents are seen viewing the Hamas-made video of their son for the first time.

In the promo, Schalit's mother, Aviva, is seen wide-eyed, cupping her hands over her mouth. A small smile curls on the face of Schalit's usually reserved father, Noam, the most public face of the family's 3-1/2-year struggle to bring home their son from the Gaza Strip.

The special, called Family in Captivity, taps into the raw emotions and sympathies for Schalit in this small country. Those sentiments are behind the strong public support for a potential prisoner swap that would return Schalit in exchange for the release of nearly 1,000 Palestinians.

There is some national debate on the issue, but relatively little agitation against a deal, despite the lopsided nature of the exchange and the potential security and political liabilities it could bring.

"Bringing Gilad Schalit home is going to cost human lives," wrote Ari Shavit, a senior columnist in Ha'aretz. "We do not know how many, we do not know their faces, we do not recognize their names. But we can assume that they walk among us."

Yet despite outlining some of the deal's downsides – motivating terrorist groups to kidnap more Israeli soldiers and civilians, the destabilizing effect it could have on Palestinian politics by boosting Hamas' standing – Shavit argues in favour of a deal.

"When it comes to Gilad Schalit, Israel has lost its senses and good judgment. Every possible mistake has been made," Shavit wrote. "Gilad has become an obsession, a focus for a national pathology. Perhaps to get well, we need to draw a line through what was and give up. To become itself again, Israel needs to get Gilad Schalit home."

The campaign to bring home Schalit, led by the highly visible actions of his family and a grassroots drive in Israel and around the world, has stoked Israelis' sense of communal empathy in a country where most families see their sons and daughters drafted into the army.

Israel has a history of making large-scale prisoner swaps in order to secure the return of even small numbers of captive soldiers, including cases where soldiers were returned in body bags. In July 2008, Israel released five Arab terrorists and the bodies of about 200 Arab fighters in exchange for the bodies of two Israeli soldiers, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, who were captured and killed in the July 2006 Hezbollah raid that sparked the Lebanon war that year.

In discussing the possible Schalit deal, Israelis are haunted by a deal that never happened: a trade for missing Israeli airman Ron Arad, who was shot down over Lebanon in 1986 and was held captive before his trail went cold. Arad is now widely presumed to be dead.

His wife, Tami, has spoken out in favour of a swap for Schalit's release.

"There is only one way to bring back a prisoner of war – to pay," she said. "Ron did not succeed in enjoying the efforts to bring him back because they were made too late. The mistakes made with Ron must not recur with Gilad. The State of Israel's deterrence will not be made or broken on the back of its PoWs."

The video of Schalit looking wan but healthy, released two months ago, has helped boost public support for a swap of this scope. The video was the first such recording since Schalit, then a 19-year-old tank crew member, was captured in a cross-border raid and spirited into Gaza in June 2006.

"Now there is clear-cut evidence that he is alive and well, it makes him even more a family member," said Alon Liel, a former director-general of the Foreign Ministry and a political scientist at Jerusalem's Hebrew University, who said Schalit has become a quasi-family member for all Israelis. The video, Liel said, "has built momentum."

For its part, the Schalit family has kept up its campaign.

Noam Schalit has made countless trips abroad to lobby international leaders and diplomats, reached out to the families of Palestinian prisoners and lobbied Israeli politicians. Since the rough terms of the potential deal became public, Schalit family members have met almost daily with cabinet ministers to press them to make a swap.

The main voices in Israel against a prisoner swap are families who lost relatives in terror attacks and now face the prospect that the perpetrators could go free. A group of such families submitted an appeal to the Israeli Supreme Court asking that the potential prisoners' names be released, so a proper public debate on the subject could take place.

But the court this week sided with the state and said the names would not be released before such an exchange, citing a commitment to the German mediator conducting talks between Hamas and Israel to keep such details confidential.

Aviv Quartet plays with youthful enthusiasm

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

The prize-winning Aviv String Quartet delivered a first-rate performance at the Berney Theatre in Winnipeg recently as part of the Israeli Concert Series.

The quartet consists of Sergey Ostrovsky and Evgenia Epshtein on violins, Vadim Makhovskiy on viola and Rachel Mercer on cello.

Mercer, who was born in Edmonton, and is of Jewish and Japanese ancestry, has been recognized by the Canada Council for the Arts recently. Through a competition, she won the three-year use of a circa 1696 Bonjour Antonio Stradivarius cello valued at $8 million.

The cello "got its own seat on the plane right next to Mercer, who took care of it all the time… but it didn't get a meal on the flight," Ostrovsky joked after the show.

The gleaming cello was played masterfully by Mercer at the Nov. 28 concert.

The Aviv Quartet, which has won first prize in chamber music competitions in Australia, France, Netherlands and Austria, was founded in 1996 in Israel. Today, all four of the Aviv Quartet's members live in different parts of the world: Ostrovsky in Geneva, Epshtein in Israel, Makhovskiy in Munich, and Mercer in Toronto.

"The four of us play together for six to seven months of the year, when we are touring together," Mercer said in an interview. Her grandmother was born in Israel, and she added that she has "lots of cousins there."

Not only is each member of the Aviv Quartet a top-notch musician, together they make a robust and splendid team. They played with youthful enthusiasm and energy, as well as impressive technical skill and grace.

The 34-year-old first violinist, Ostrovsky, who moved to Israel at age 16, told The CJN he began playing the violin by age six.

"I came from a musical family. We lived in Gorky, in the former Soviet Union. My father was a concert pianist, as was my mother. My father performed all the time and was a great inspiration. My sister, who now lives in Boston, is a professional pianist, and my brother in Israel is also professional pianist," he said.

The Aviv Quartet played Shubert's Quartettsatz, Haydn's Emperor Quartet, Dvorak's American Quartet, and a movement of a quartet by Israeli composer Uri Brenner.

"Brenner, our good friend, composed this music especially for us," said Ostrovsky, who has won first prize in the Israeli Violin Competition.

Makhovskiy's melodic flare and Old World presence was evident particularly while he was performing Dvorak's work. Makhovskiy, who was born in Russia, also performs with the Symphony of the Americas.

Epshtein, a co-founder of the quartet, who delivered a sterling performance, also began playing the violin at age six. She received a master's degree from the Rotterdam Royal Academy, where she received prizes in violin and chamber music competitions.

"When I am not performing, I sometimes teach violin a little in the summer," she said.

In an encore, the Aviv Quartet performed an exquisite rendition of Eli Eli, a poem written by Hannah Senesh, and a lighthearted rendition of Shirim Pshootim (Simple Songs). Both were arranged by Arieh Schechter of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra.

During Shirim Pshootim, the faces of the musicians and the audience members were lit up with grins, ending the concert on an exultant note.

After the impressive performance, Ostrovsky said that the Aviv Quartet, which has a repertoire of more than 100 chamber works, is working on a new CD.

To be released in April on the Nexus label, the CD will include the music of Jewish composer Erwin Schulhoff.

"Schulhoff died in a concentration camp at age 44, after the Nazis overran Czechoslovakia. He was not able fulfil his potential," said Ostrovsky

Additionally, the quartet will record the music of Hungarian Erno Dohnanyi.

"He wasn't Jewish, but he received an award from the State of Israel for saving Jews during the Holocaust," said Ostrovsky.

One of Dohnanyi's son's was executed by the Nazis for his role in a plot to assassinate Hitler.

Before performing in Winnipeg, the Aviv Quartet played in Mexico and San Diego.

Jerry Gray of The Travellers receives award

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Jerry Gray, the leader of the folk-music group The Travellers, was recently awarded a lifetime achievement award by the Ontario Federation of Labour (OFL).

Gray, who founded The Travellers in Toronto in 1953, is the first Jewish winner of the prestigious award. He was honoured for his 60-year musical career and recognized for his significant contributions to the development of the arts in the labour movement.

"The Ontario award was a complete surprise for me," Gray says. "I am delighted and honoured, firstly because I was nominated for the award by my own union, and secondly, it's nice to be recognized in a field that I spent my life."

Jerry Gray at the OFL's biennial convention

Gray was nominated for the OFL award by Jim Boros, president of the Toronto Musician's Association.

In his long musical career, Gray has been in the forefront of the fight for human and civil rights. In 1963, he joined with Harry Belafonte and Oscar Peterson to stage a benefit concert at the O'Keefe Centre (now the Sony Centre for the Performing Arts) in Toronto in support of Martin Luther King Jr., at which they sang We Shall Overcome.

Jerry Gray of The Travellers

Along with labour material, The Travellers perform for children and a variety of adult groups. Their repertoire includes traditional Canadian and American folk songs, First Nations songs and international music.

Last May, Gray and The Travellers hosted a tribute concert in Toronto to celebrate Pete Seeger's life and songs. Seeger, 90, has been a prominent figure in the American folk-music scene for more than 70 years.

In 2001, the National Film Board produced a 90-minute documentary about The Travellers' early years called The Travellers: This Land Is Your Land. It has been shown on television several times and at several film festivals.

Gray divides his time performing, either as a solo act or with The Travellers, and teaching at several Florida universities, where he is a professor of folk-music studies.

"I enjoy teaching very much because when I teach a historical song that people recognize, I teach them where the song was written and the circumstances under which it was written. My students' appreciation is most gratifying," he says.

In June 2010, Gray will be the first Canadian to win the Joe Hill Award, which is awarded annually by the Washington-based Labor Heritage Foundation American Federation of Labor/ Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL/CIO) to leaders and artists who have contributed to the integration of arts and culture in the labour movement.

Gray says that as the first Canadian to receive this award, he joins the "list of outstanding winners, including Pete Seeger and [labour activist] Cesar Chavez.".

HAROLD GREEN THEATRE COMPANY TO STAGE NATHANSON'S TALK

The Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company is preparing to fill a hole in its 2010 season with the Toronto première of Talk, a play by Winnipeg playwright Michael Nathanson, artistic director of the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre. The play is "a funny, complex and touching look at a friendship torn apart by clashing views," and was a finalist for this year's Governor General's Award for drama. Ted Dykstra has been selected to direct the Toronto production.

The hole in HGJTC's upcoming season appeared after the company was obliged to drop its previously announced production of Yichud (Seclusion) due to the unfortunate withdrawal of a sponsor. However, HGJTC "continues to support" the production, which it had intended to mount jointly with Theatre Passe Muraille, now that long-established Toronto company is going to be its sole producer. Even so, HGJTC "has made a financial commitment to ensure that Yichud will be experienced by Toronto audiences," said artistic directors Avery Saltzman and David Eisner in a statement.

Talk opens in March at the St. Lawrence Centre, Jane Mallet Theatre. Details on cast and crew are forthcoming. $20 to $69. 416-366-7723, www.stlc.com

Names in the News: American literary scholar Harriet Riesen has an interesting family. Her great-uncles and aunts include Abraham Reisen, the Yiddish poet; Zalman Reisen, a founder of the YIVO Institute, and Sarah Reisen who translated Shakespeare for the Yiddish theatre. Harriet Riesen is a specialist in the 19th-century American author Louisa May Alcott, and has written a book and co-produced a film both titled Louisa May Alcott: The Woman Behind Little Women. (The film airs on PBS Dec. 28, 9 p.m.)

Astonishingly, Riesen has been exploring the possibility that Alcott may have been Jewish, asserting that she looked Jewish and may have been descended from Portuguese Jews; the family name May was formerly Mayo, a variation of Mayer that was common in Portugal. www.alcottfilm.com

Electric violinist goes with the flow

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Dr. Draw tends to go with his gut.

It was his gut that told him to pick up a violin when he was about 10 years old, his gut that told him to hold his first concert on a street corner in downtown Toronto and his gut that helps him compose song after song.

Dr. Draw

"A lot of things in my life are purely impulsive and instinctive," said Dr. Draw, 27, who is an electric violinist and leader of the band Dr. Draw. "I don't follow too much reason – that's kind of what propelled my career."

Dr. Draw, a.k.a. Eugene Draw, immigrated to Canada from Moscow when he was almost 11. As a way of keeping him out of trouble, his mother, who is a ballet dancer, and father, who owned a theatre company in Russia, tried to get him involved in an extracurricular activity.

"I said I wanted to play the violin, so they got a cheap violin at a pawn shop," he said.

While the musician couldn't pinpoint why he chose the violin, Draw quickly realized he had a talent. When he was about 13, he got bored of playing at home and decided to take his music to the streets.

"I was a busker for many years," he said. "I needed to go out and perform… I saw performances on the TV, my mom was a ballerina… I was always in that type of environment."

Although classical music is usually at the base of Draw's songs, he was never a classical musician. As a busker, he'd sometimes perform with drummers and rappers.

"I had a solid busking career, I was getting bookings, skipping school and focusing on my musical career," he said. "I learned to compose on the spot, how to capture the moment as people were walking by."

By 17, Draw was a full-time musician.

Now, at 27, he has toured the world. He performed with Bette Midler in San Francisco, with Seal in Hong Kong and played for the prime minister of Singapore.

When he was about 21, the violinist formed the band Dr. Draw, which is currently made up of Eugene Le Russe on electric cello, Tim Bones on guitar, Reza Shaffaf on bass, Adam Hay on drums, Jeff Côte as a guest drummer, Andrew Chan on electric harp and Janine White on keyboard.

Before then, he had been involved in various bands, ranging from rock to hip hop, he said.

"I wanted something of my own."

His band has been described as classical-pop fusion, indie rock and jazz-rock fusion, but Draw refuses to classify his sound.

"It's none of the above, we work on a song-by-song basis," he said. "There's no classification, I call it the glitch in the niche."

Dr. Draw's fourth CD, which was released in January 2009, embraces this concept. Called Distinctively Unclassified, it's the result of impulse and improvisation.

"The best songs write themselves," said Draw, who works with bandmate Le Russe when composing. "I just sit down and improvise for hours, and then an idea develops."

After his years as a busker, Draw likes being in the public eye. While rehearsing, his band will often invite people to come and watch.

"They bring bottles of wine, sit and watch us work," he said. "It's a totally different way of working, putting yourself in a spotlight, not being afraid of being vulnerable."

Dr. Draw will perform at Hugh's Room from Dec. 11 to 14. Tickets are $35 in advance, $40 at the door. For tickets, call 416-531-6604 or visit www.hughsroom.com. The show starts at 8:30 p.m.

WWII child evacuee pens a compelling memoir

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Kitty Wintrob didn't plan to write a book when she began making notes about her experiences as a child evacuee in England during World War II.

Wintrob was one of thousands of children evacuated from London and other major English cities to rural areas in 1940, after the Nazis invaded France.

"On a cold winter day more than 20 years ago, I decided to set down some of my memories of my evacuation during the war, as I wanted to leave these memories to my children and grandchildren," she says.

Her memories became the basis for her recently published book, I'm Not Going Back: Wartime Memoir of a Child Evacuee (Now and Then Books).

"Since my book has been published and received with such enthusiasm, it has allowed me to speak to many Jewish and non-Jewish groups, including schools and several churches," Wintrob, the grandmother of two boys, says.

"I speak about the experiences of children, particularly Jewish children thrust into a non-Jewish environment. Since I lost my vision, my husband, Ralph, a retired teacher and library consultant, accompanies me to my presentations and signings, and he reads passages from my book and I talk about my experiences."

As a young student in London, England, Kitty Wintrob received numerous prizes for her essays. When she came to Canada in 1959 to marry Ralph, she joined the Toronto Guild of Puppetry and made and worked with puppets. While her two children were growing up, she taught at Hillcrest Progressive School and says that she always enjoyed reading and telling stories to the children.

About 25 years ago, her daughter, journalist Suzanne Wintrob, read some of her notes and suggested that they both enrol in a creative writing course.

Kitty Wintrob's work was praised by the instructor and the students, and she continued taking writing workshops.

Looking back, she says that she is pleased she wrote about this period in history and the plight of young children during the war who were displaced from their families, "because there are so few books that are written about that subject in that period in history."

Her full-length manuscript lay in a drawer until three years ago, when her family printed a small number of copies as a birthday gift for her.

Kitty Wintrob

When CJN columnist Bill Gladstone, who is also an editor and publisher, received a copy of the book, he says he liked the story so much that he acquired the right to publish it through his company, Now and Then Books, which focuses on the Toronto Jewish community.

"I was greatly impressed when I first read Kitty's book," Gladstone says. "She tells a compelling story that also sheds light on a little-known aspect of World War II.

Canadian students help prevent spread of malaria in Ghana

By CLARE HILL
Special to The CJN

When Mike Kapps visited Ghana the summer he graduated from high school, he contracted the disease that is the leading cause of death in the country.

"I actually ended up getting malaria myself, which wasn't a fun experience," the third-year Harvard University economics student said.

It was difficult for Kapps, who was in Cape Coast, the capital of the central region of Ghana, for a medical internship, to reconcile the fact that he was able to get quick access to medication that many Africans have to wait weeks to get – if they can afford it.

So the Thornhill, Ont., native decided to tackle the issue by forming his own NGO called the Ahoto Partnership for Ghana.

Created in 2008, Ahoto – which means "freedom" in Fante, a Ghanaian dialect – is a student-run, non-profit sister organization to the Free Foundation, run by Ghanaian residents Kapps befriended during his stay.

The two groups work together to prevent the spread of malaria by providing health education and mosquito nets to the people of Akotokyir, a village of 5,000 people in the slum regions of Ghana.

One of their main concerns is teaching people to boil water (currently an uncommon practice), as access to clean water is limited and expensive.

"I thought that my efforts didn't have to be particularly big to impact change in the community," said Kapps, who started funding the group with his own money.

"Five dollars will buy a mosquito net, which would prevent a child from getting malaria, and that is the equivalent [cost] of buying a Starbucks [drink]," Kapps said.

But the 20-year-old isn't working alone. With five other university students sitting on the executive board, as well as volunteers at Harvard and in Ghana, the organization is an international effort.

This month, Kapps travels to Ghana to oversee their winter campaign with his childhood friend and executive board member, Adam Kahn. They're flying on their own dime and plan to distribute 1,000 mosquito nets, starting with families with children, in Akotokyir and surrounding areas.

Having taken surveys of the area, Ahoto has been working on the basis of what the people's main concerns are.

But what got Kapps really excited was seeing the results of the three-day health camp they planned last summer for Akotokyir. For about $250, the group was able to bring in nurses and doctors who diagnosed and treated between 400 and 500 people.

"They caught all kinds of afflictions that were shocking to me," Kapps said. The medical team diagnosed cases such as tuberculosis, malaria and gangrene, which could have led to amputations if not treated.

"That's when the light bulb turned on," Kapps said. "If we could serve as someone who connects the dots, the community could leverage itself."

Focusing on one area is the best way to start making a difference, said Kahn, a third-year business administration student at Wilfrid Laurier University.

"We don't have the background or resources to overthrow [the afflictions] of a continent," he said.

"So we're focusing on one area and we do operate with a scalable model that, if it's successful in this village, we can expand into other villages."

What also sets Ahoto apart is their plan to further implement Ghana's National Health Insurance Scheme (NHIS), making it the first NGO that includes NHIS registration along with mosquito net distribution in its plan.

One of the benefits of the NHIS, which is currently free for pregnant women and children under three, is that trips to health clinics would become more accessible, Kahn says.

"Right now, even if you do come down with something, it's often not affordable to obtain malaria treatment, which is something that is relatively cheap," he said.

There are still a lot of people who are not registered for NHIS and are not receiving benefit from it, Kahn said. Ahoto is hoping to get every child in the community registered by the end of January, as well as subsidize registry costs for the elderly and those in great need.

"It's ideal charitable work," said Nicole Gileadi, another member of Ahoto's executive board and a friend of Kapps and Kahn.

"You have this immediate impact, which is fantastic."

The third-year political science major at McGill University was first drawn to Ahoto because of the immediate change she witnessed.

"There's direct transparency within the group," she said.

Since every member pays for their own costs, every cent of each donation they receive goes towards the cause.

"We want to offer volunteers here in Canada and the U.S. ownership over their projects because when people feel directly involved, you tend to get better results," Gileadi said.

It was this line of thinking that prompted the three friends to ask this year's leadership class at their former high school, Thornhill Secondary School, to create six projects geared towards helping Ahoto.

Gileadi, who hopes to travel to Ghana this summer, would love to see chapters of Ahoto around the world, including one at McGill.

Gileadi, Kapps and Kahn, all of whom are Jewish, are volunteering in hopes of improving the lives of the less fortunate, which falls in line with the Jewish philosophy of tikkun olam, repairing the world.

"I think we all have a vision of a better world," Kahn said.

"It's something toward which every religion strives. Those of us in Ahoto, like countless others worldwide, certainly believe in the cause of helping those less fortunate, and we're all lucky enough to have the means to do so."

Kapps believes that in the end, a more sustainable solution has to come from the community itself, and once health-care initiatives kick in, he hopes to see entrepreneurship develop.

Ghana has a vibrant university, Kapps says, and Cape Coast is a developed place where he wouldn't hesitate to vacation. But even though Akotokyir and other communities lie directly on the outskirts, there are inherent frictions between the slums and the cities, he says.

"I don't see this initiative ending just in this community. Our hope is that we have geographical expansion... That could definitely be accomplished within the next two years."

For more information about the Ahoto Partnership for Ghana, visit www.ahotopartnership.org, join their Facebook group or e-mail them directly at contact@ahotopartners.org.

Mike Kapps, during his visit to Ghana, offered first aid care at an elementary school.

Adam Kahn said he feels lucky to have the means to help the less fortunate.

A child in Akotokyir waits to be seen by a doctor during the three-day health camp Ahoto planned last summer.

Shanghai's role as a wartime Jewish haven is chronicled

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Shanghai, known as the "Paris of the Orient," had a population of about 3.5 million in the late 1930s when the first batch of some 20,000 Jewish refugees from Germany, Austria and Poland began arriving.

Fleeing Nazi persecution, they chose this colourful and cosmopolitan port in China as a haven because entry visas were not required. Passport control had been in the hands of the Chinese Nationalist government, but when order broke down after the Japanese invasion of China, Shanghai became a completely open city, enabling Jews to enter freely.

Irene Eber

They remained in this throbbing and exotic centre of industry and culture for several years, leaving at the end of World War II and taking with them pungent memories of this utterly alien, tumultuous city.

Historians and former residents have written a succession of books about this intriguing footnote in modern Jewish history. The latest one, Voices from Shanghai: Jewish Exiles in Wartime China (The University of Chicago Press), is by Irene Eber, a professor emeritus of East Asian studies at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. A hybrid of sorts, it is both a historical narrative and an eyewitness account.

She begins with a fairly brief essay, during which she places that era into its proper context, and then introduces a reader to a collection of letters, diaries, poems and short stories composed by the refugees themselves. These entries deal with all facets of life in Shanghai, and some are touching, .

Shanghai had a fairly large foreign community of more than 50 nationalities when the German and Austrian refugees disembarked.

The Russians lived in the French Concession district, while the British and Americans resided in the International Settlement. The Japanese were concentrated in Hongkew.

Excluding the Japanese, Shanghai was home to approximately 50,000 foreigners, of whom around 8,000 were Russian and Sephardi Jews, at least by Eber's estimate.

The Russians settled after the 1904-05 Russo-Japanese War and the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution, while the Sephardim arrived from Iraq and India. One of the Sephardi newcomers, Silas Aaron Hardoon (1851-1931), a real estate tycoon, owned many properties along Nanking Road, a famous thoroughfare.

By contrast, the Jews from Germany and Austria were not only destitute, but also culturally different from the established Russian and Sephardi communities. They gravitated to Hongkew, an extension of the International Settlement, because rents tended to be cheaper.

In the winter of 1943, less than two years after Japan occupied Shanghai, the Japanese authorities declared Hongkew a designated area. Stateless persons who reached the city after 1937 were forced to live in Hongkew.

According to Eber, "despair" and "outrage" greeted Japan's proclamation. To the Jews, the designated area was little more than a ghetto, since no one could come and go without special passes. Nonetheless, the Jewish inhabitants of Hongkew established an astonishingly rich cultural life, she says. Theatres and publishing companies sprang up, as did a coffee house culture, and German and Yiddish newspapers emerged.

With the eruption of the Chinese civil war in 1946, the refugees packed their bags and immigrated to Canada, Australia, the United States and the new State of Israel. "They carried with them memories that for children and teenagers were somehow gilded, filled with wonder, while their parents would remember the hardships of those Shanghai years, the culture shock that greeted them upon arrival," Eber observes.

Their letters, diaries, poems and stories certainly shed light on that period.

Annie Witting (1904-1971), whose family was originally from Poznan, Poland, described everyday conditions. "We were living 34 people to a room," she writes in a letter dated July 1939. "From a European perspective, bathroom facilities are indescribably bad."

The climate was difficult. "It is always humid, both in warm and cold weather," she reported, adding that only boiled water and fruits could be consumed and that mosquito nets were absolutely necessary.

Yet, as she notes, there was a positive side to Shanghai, too. Its fancy flats, villas, parks, theatres, movie houses and department stores were alluring. "Sometimes I feel as if I actually live in a fairy tale," she exults.

Yehoshua Rapoport (1895-1971), a journalist who was born in Bialystok, Poland, and worked in Berlin, felt "uncomfortable" in his new environment. As he put it in 1941, "We still feel sharply our uprooted condition, and we are no longer nourished by [the] roots [of our home]."

Yosl Moletek (1918-2000), a Polish Jew from Proszomice, was a poet and educator who briefly lived in Canada before settling in New York City in 1949. In two of his poems, The Lament of a Mother and A Letter, he dealt with the pain and loneliness of dislocation. In another poem, Shanghai, he seemed riveted by its nocturnal charms, comparing its dazzling neon lights to "a marvellous rainbow."

Yoni Fayn, born in Poland in 1914, was a poet and painter. In A Poem About Shanghai Ghetto, he portrayed the city in almost apocalyptic terms.

Great is Shanghai, lawless and wild,
Full of bodies, wind and mice,
Full of talk, falling heavy,
Full of tears – white like rice.
A hundred nations thrown together
Are rotting on its wet terrain,
Greed and gold intermingle,
Wiped out by the rain.

Shoshana Kahn (1895-1968), who hailed from Lodz, Poland, was an actress. Her diary is revealing.

"What we feared has finally happened," she wrote on Feb. 18, 1943. "Today the official proclamation appeared that everyone who came after 1937 must move into a special neighbourhood. One is ashamed to call it by its real name, ghetto. In truth, we will be locked inside a ghetto. And for this we had to run thousands of miles in order to fall into a ghetto here." Kahn also wrote of the prevalence of "real hunger" and of "vitamin deficiencies."

On July 18, 1945, she switched gears, describing a U.S. bombing raid in which 40 Jews were accidentally killed.

"People had not yet calmed down from last night's bombardment, when a heavy attack occurred again today. The Jewish doctors work day and night, bandaging and operating… Without medicines and without instruments, they perform operations with plain knives. The refugees work with superhuman strength to save those who are buried in the ruins. Everyone is very upset that the Americans bombed the ghetto."

But in an afterthought, she said that the presence of American aircraft over Shanghai signified that the end of the war was at hand.

Judging by these entries, Voices from Shanghai adds to our knowledge of China as a sanctuary for Jews who were fortunate enough to have escaped from Nazi tyranny in the nick of time.

Kings' Casspi is the first Israeli to play in the NBA

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

An Israeli basketball player playing in the National Basketball Association (NBA) can no longer be put in the same category as such mythical creatures as the Abominable Snowman or the Loch Ness Monster.

Omri Casspi, a small forward at six-foot-nine and 225 pounds, has cracked the lineup of the Sacramento Kings, and the Jewish rookie now enjoys the rare distinction of being the first Israeli ever to play in the NBA.

There have been many prominent Israeli hoopsters over the years who made names for themselves, but that was back home with the powerhouse Maccabi Tel Aviv, the New York Yankees of Israeli basketball, who win regularly both at home and often abroad in the Euroleague.

Former Israeli basketball stars who became prominent celebrities and are now in their 50s and 60s – such as Miki Berkowitz, Barry Leibowitz, Moti Aroesti, Doron Jamchi and Tal Brody – are household names back home, but not in North America.

More recently, two other Israeli players came close when they were chosen in the 2006 NBA Draft, but never got to play in a game – forward Lior Eliyahu, who was selected in the second round (44th) by the Orlando Magic and promptly dealt to the Houston Rockets, and Yotam Halperin, a guard who was also taken in Round 2 (53rd) by the Seattle Supersonics. Oded Katash had a tryout with the New York Knicks 10 years ago but never appeared in a game.

The problem with being selected in the second round of the NBA Draft is that only first rounders get a guaranteed contract.

Casspi first declared himself eligible for the 2008 NBA Draft, but he withdrew before the declaration deadline after failing to receive a first-round draft guarantee from any of the clubs, which often signal their interest to young players.

In 2009, Omri declared himself eligible for the draft again, an advantage that U.S. college players don't enjoy, but international prospects do. Casspi hit the jackpot when Sacramento chose him in the first round at number 23.

Now, wearing the number 18 (Chai) on his uniform, Casspi is secure in the fact that his three-year, $3.5-million (US) contract, is guaranteed and thus far, less than a quarter of the way into the regular season, it appears Omri is adjusting well to the American game.

In a recent game that pitted Sacramento against Golden State Warriors, Casspi, despite an injured left ankle, played 36 minutes and finished with 12 points, 10 rebounds, five assists and three steals. All four of his baskets, out of six shots taken in the 120-107 victory, were three-pointers.

After 17 games coming off the bench, he was averaging almost 24 minutes of playing time and about 10 points per game, and the youthful Kings had a somewhat surprising record of 9 wins and 8 losses.

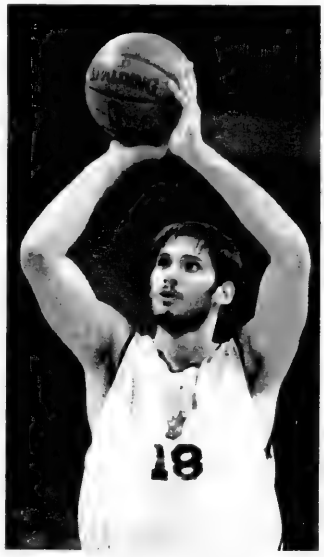
Casspi began playing with Hapoel Holon's junior teams and turned pro at age 17 with Maccabi Tel Aviv during the 2005-06 season. His club went on to win the Israeli Super League title as well as the Euroleague championship.

The following year, Casspi joined Hapoel Galil Elyon on loan and returned to Maccabi in 2007, where he played until 2009, compiling a field goal average of 51 per cent, 71 per cent on free throws, 65 steals, 25 blocks, 3.5 rebounds and averaging 10 points per game.

In 2008 Casspi was voted the Israeli league's "Sixth Man of the Year," an award given to the most outstanding first-off-the-bench player.

Casspi has provided a ray of hope for other aspiring young Israelis who want to play in the NBA. Nimrod Tishman recently committed to the University of Florida, and Carmel Bouchman accepted a scholarship to Temple University.

At one time, about 15 to 20 years ago, the University of Connecticut Huskies had several Israelis in their lineups: Uri Cohen-Mintz, whose father, Donchum, was an outstanding player in the 1960s in Israel, as well as Nadav Henefield, Gilad Katz, Doron Sheffer, and female player Orly Grossman.



Omri Casspi

The only other Jewish player in the NBA today is Jordan Farmar of the Los Angeles Lakers. His Jewish mother, Melinda Kolani, and his dad Damon Farmar, an African-American who once played minor pro baseball as an outfielder, divorced when their son was only two. Farmar's stepfather is Yehuda Kolani, an Israeli from Tel Aviv, and he and his wife raised their son Jewish.

Last summer the Los Angeles-born Farmar, a 6-2 point guard out of UCLA, hosted basketball clinics in Jerusalem for Jewish and Arab children and was also part of the Chabad Telethon.

Germany restores 1936 athletic record to Jewish woman

JTA

NEW YORK — Germany has restored the 1936 high jump record to a Jewish woman.

Gretel Bergmann was kicked off Germany's 1936 Olympic track and field team, which she joined in 1934, because she was Jewish, despite matching the high-jump record of five feet, three inches.

Bergmann, now known as Margaret Lambert, 95, lives in the Queens borough of New York City.

She has been recognized by the German track and field association in past years. Restoring her record is an "act of justice and a symbolic gesture," the association said.

She fled Nazi Germany in 1937 for New York.

A Japanese Chanukah bush?

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

The TV's on, and my two kids are staring at it. To my horror, from time to time, I hear Christmas tunes chirping out of their nice little Jewish throats.

Like a sign from above, my daughter gives me a sharp look and says: "Mommy, this year, we want a tree!"

At night, in bed, I notify my husband of the botanic news. Meir looks at me in horror.

"I knew it wouldn't be long," he whispers. "No way. There's no way a Christmas tree will stand in my home!"

"You're right," I agree passionately. "As festive as it would be, we're not having it, nor those bright lights and glassy ornaments!"

"Or any of those beautiful, sparkling angels, and all of those amazing, gorgeous stars," he adds.

"Look, we haven't come to Canada in order to imitate the gentiles," I say. "So, no tree will ever stand in the middle of our living room."

"Or in the corner of our dining room, where the lamp would shine on it so perfectly!" summarizes Meir.

I turn off the light and sigh. "We'll have to make it up to them, though."

The next day, we're strolling hectically through the busy mall, surrounded by all the Santa Clauses and trees. "

"This is madness," I declare. "How come a simple Barbie doll costs so much? How can we, poor newcomers, celebrate Christmas, without a penny to our name?"

Meir looks at me icily.

"We need to indemnify the kids," I remind him.

He's annoyed. "Sure, why don't you buy the redhead Barbie too, and the Barbie house."

After the house and its tenants are all wrapped up, we buy some binoculars, cameras and two computers for the boy.

When we argue whether or not to get the Nintendo, too, the lovely saleslady reminds us: "After all, it's Christmas!"

Meir replies sternly: "We don't celebrate Christmas!"

The saleslady is all smiles. "Happy Hanukkah!" she cries, so the two immigrants purchase another seven DVDs and a few hundreds CDs.

Later, we all stand near the chanukiyah, watching the candles, and then, like diligent ants, we start slogging the presents on our sore shoulders toward the living room.

"Happy Chanukah!" we shout ecstatically, while watching the kids as they unwrap the goods.

But all we get are some polite thank yous.

I can't take it anymore. "What's the matter with you?" I shout. "Why do you look so disappointed?"

My son looks at me quietly. "All we wanted was a tree," he says.

"No tree in this house!" I'm unstoppable now. "And there'll never be, either! For generations, Jewish people were massacred, and now…"

Meir tries to calm me down. My little girl starts to cry.

"Mom," my son says gently, "we didn't know that Jews were massacred because of a miniature Japanese orange tree."

A miniature orange tree? Japanese?

It turns out they saw a commercial on TV about this miniature Japanese tree and that was the present they wanted for Chanukah. It comes with an adorable flower pot and costs next to nothing.

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Recently, I took part in a workshop run by the Canadian Association for the Advancement of Women and Sport and Physical Activity that examined data collected on physical inactivity levels for women 55 to 70 years old.

The data came from a two-year, cross-Canada study to identify barriers to physical activity, as well as solutions and practices to increase physical activity for women ages 55 to 70. The study also aimed to increase awareness about the importance of physical activity and to evaluate the current and future impact of the study in increasing physical activity in 55- to 70-year-olds.

Most of the findings didn't surprise me, such as that inactivity leads to many health and quality-of-life consequences, since inactive people are more susceptible to obesity, high blood pressure and heart disease.

What did surprise me were the numbers. The Canadian Fitness and Lifestyle Research Institute reported that in 2002, 68 per cent of Canadian women aged 55 to 70 were inactive, compared to 53 per cent of men in the same age group. This group also had the highest obesity rates.

This group is growing, and the baby boomers are the largest section of the Canadian population, so by sheer numbers, their impact on health care costs are and will be immense. Reaching adults in this age group, especially women, and getting them to become active is emerging as more and more of a priority.

The study looked at women with both active and inactive lifestyles to find out how both felt about exercise. The biggest differences were the internal barriers, such as comfort, confidence, fear and guilt. The study broke down each barrier and came up with proposed solutions for each, such as women-only programs, finding a workout partner or a group, and family-based activity programs.

One of the biggest trends today is small group classes, led by an instructor and held at someone's home or small studio. This type of training provides lots of positive effects.

If you'd like to learn more about this study or how to become more active, contact me at felycesfitness@rogers.com.

Jewish simchahs are bankrupting us

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

We've developed an unfair culture among our people when it comes to gift-giving for weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs.

Over the years, many of our simchahs (celebrations) have moved away from being holy times when we humbly danced, sang and ate to celebrate our children's rites of passage, after which $36 cash, a Cross pen or a set of chumashim was just fine as a gift.

Nowadays, we've decided instead that our simchahs must be huge, themed extravaganzas organized by event planners and resembling an island retreat more than a modest place of Jewish familial merriment.

Along with this showy growth came the belief that because my hosts are paying $150 for my meal, I should increase my gift in turn. A sense developed that we are all in this simchah together and will, therefore, share the cost. On top of this, you're expected to give what the invitee gave you or your child for your simchah.

Out of this was born the $150-plus present.

Adding to the problem are community members who need to appear rich in the eyes of their judgmental guests and borrow money to pay for their child's celebration. The hosts then pray that their guests' presents will be platinum-encrusted or in Eurodollars, acting as a sort of bailout to repay their debt.

If you have the money and want to create a Super Bowl halftime show for your child, go ahead. If you want to borrow money to make a party for your 12- or 13-year-old, borrow away.

But here's the problem: most of your invitees are trying to save funds for their retirement, not underwrite an Xbox or help pay down your liability.

Many people who make a reasonable living have told me that they've decided a few times not to attend a simchah because they couldn't afford to. On the flip side, an educator in our community said he was invited to three simchahs in one weekend and was embarrassed not to attend them, so he put out $150 each (for a total of $450) for presents. He didn't have the money and would have preferred to duck out, but he didn't because of the shame.

Why are our annual expenditures for attending bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings third on our overall personal budget list, after car insurance and the mortgage? Attending a simchah should be a joy, not a cause for overdraft protection.

We as a community of gift-givers must recognize that an enormous investment or loan for a simchah is part of our own individual financial Jewish planning, not anybody else's. Further, let's consider that current Jewish party customs and the expectations that come with them are out of control and unfair.

Here are some solutions: a gift doesn't need to be money. Instead, call the individual who is celebrating to determine what they would like to receive. If you can't afford a gift, write a meaningful card.

If you have helped out with the simchah, don't give a gift. Your assistance is worth something.

Don't make extravaganzas in place of a simchah. But if you do, appreciate all presents. Consider putting on your invitation "gifts optional" or "gifts go to tzedakah," allowing the giver the chance to make a thoughtful gift at any level.

As well, let's create a community formula for giving: for every $50,000 of income, a person could give $36, up to 10 times a year. After that, we can hand our hosts a lovely table cloth from the Baycrest gift shop.

When you invite me to your simchah, you are gifting me with your friendship. When I attend, I am reciprocating through my presence, participation and a humble gift.

That's true gift-giving. It's fair, and it creates a true sense of joining in your simchah.

The exquisite sense of spellbinding wonder

The adorable little girl above is lighting Chanukah's first candle with the gravity and total attention the occasion deserves. Her classmates are entirely transfixed upon the delicate but skilfully executed transfer of flame and light from the shamash to the candle.

We see in their eyes the exquisite sense of spellbinding wonder that the lighting of a Chanukah candle evokes.

Clearly, to this kindergarten gathering, the procedure is not merely a slight act, nor a perfunctory performance of a religious ritual.

It is something more, even though they don't yet know how much more. They are fascinated and held happily in the guileless splendour of the moment.

If we – their parents and grandparents – could only harness the laser-like focus, mighty concentration and sense of thrall that we see reflected in the wide-eyed expressions of these children, we might discover, at least during the holiday, a happier, more generous, more comforting, more compassionate world than the one we usually think we inhabit.

It is no abrogation of adult responsibilities to seek and to find honest happiness with the world, even as it is – imperfect and so very needy of our promise to help make it better.

Chanukah is surely a propitious time for this.

Lighting and then displaying the lit candles are our religious obligation.

But they can also be our motivation.

Brightness and light are a compelling metaphor for withstanding a quickly darkening and light-deprived winter backdrop.

With our children and our families at our side or in our thoughts, and especially for them, we use the brightness and the light of the holiday as our reminders and our instruments for trying to make the world a better place.

As we all reflect upon and take part in the holiday, we hope the eclectic collection of articles, stories and photos in this supplement will make its celebration more enjoyable. We hope as well, at some point in the holiday, each of us in our own way, will be able to experience, like the children above, the exquisite sense of spellbinding wonder. Chag Urim Samayach. The editor

Toronto Stock Exchange targets Israeli 'clean-tech' companies

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

The Toronto Stock Exchange (TSX) is courting several Israeli companies, half of which fall into the "clean tech" or renewable energy category.

The TSX's senior manager of global diversified industrials, Raymond King, met with representatives of several environmentally friendly companies in Israel last month.

He had discussions with the heads of venture capital firms, as well as private equity investors, to further a three-year-long process of attracting Israeli companies to launch IPOs, or initial public offerings, on the TSX.

"We have extended IPO offers to several companies in Israel," said King, adding that 50 per cent of these companies fall into the "clean tech" or renewable energy category, with the other half in the mid-tech category, medical devices and pure technology industries.

The TSX is the world's largest market for clean tech, with 135 listed companies in the field, King said.

"We are the global clean tech exchange. There is a huge amount of investor interest in clean-tech," he said, adding that the TSX hopes to have five to seven Israeli companies on board by the end of 2010.

If King succeeds in signing any companies – this was his eighth trip to Israel – it will represent the first direct presence of Israeli companies on the TSX.

Though the TSX has listed Canadian or American subsidiaries of Israeli companies, or Israeli-connected companies, it has not listed them directly.

At the end of 2007, two Israeli companies filed for IPOs with the TSX, but couldn't follow through due to the collapse of the global capital market.

AORA's 'Power Flower' station, so named due to the unique yellow tulip design concept for the plant's solar tower created by architect Haim Dotan. It consists of a field of 30 tracking mirrors (heliostats) situated on half an acre of land.

"Their timing was awful, so they pulled back on their IPOs," King said.

In the following year and a half, the TSX, along with the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce, channelled their efforts into building relationships and educating Israelis about the Canadian exchange, which is the eighth largest in the world.

"[Israel] is a great market for us. It has always been strong in innovation, and when it comes to clean tech, we are starting to see more and more Israeli companies in that space. There has always been a push here, where natural resources are limited, to develop wind, water and solar technologies to maximize resources while leaving a minimum footprint on the environment," King said.

Since 1976, Israeli builders have been required to install solar water-heating systems in apartments, and in July 2008, the national electric company started buying excess electricity generated by residential solar systems, thus promoting their use.

Over the last 10 months, the TSX has helped raise more than $50 billion (US) through equity offerings, $1 billion of which was raised by the clean-tech industry. Both are record figures for the exchange.

Now that the capital market has improved, the TSX has renewed its efforts in Israel.

According to King, the record clean-tech financing figures can in part be attributed to the participation of Ram Power Corp., an Israeli-connected company that is listed on the TSX. Ram Power Corp's head, Hezy Ram, raised $180 million from Canadian investment banks and conducted a takeover of two TSX-listed geothermal companies.

"We were quite happy about that," King said. "It speaks to the opportunity for Israeli clean-tech companies to access capital from our capital markets, and to forge co-operation with Canadian clean-tech companies."

He added that he hopes Israeli companies will see the financing opportunities as an advantage to launching an IPO on the TSX.

'A world leader when it comes to clean technology'

Along with bringing Israeli companies onto the exchange, the TSX aims to promote partnerships between Israeli and Canadian companies, King said.

Earlier this year, with the guidance of TSX and the Eilat-Eilot Regional Development Council, several Israeli renewable energy companies met with Toronto-based investment bankers and other investors, which led to several IPO offers from the TSX. Joint ventures between Israeli companies and their counterparts in Toronto were also discussed.

"We see this as part of our role – to encourage more co-operative business activity and start driving business in both directions, for both countries," King said.

"Israel is a world leader when it comes to clean technology developments, however, the companies behind these developments often have trouble marketing their technology and raising money – this is where we see our added value in any partnerships we establish."

The TSX extends this advisory role to companies on the exchange, and the venture capitals connected to them.

"It's a very Canadian thing. Quite frankly, we are the friendlier North Americans. This has always been the way that we do our business development – by building relationships we create a more sustainable business model," King said.

"We want to make sure that [companies] are prepared to sustain their listing once they're there."

This has been one of the major problems for Israeli companies that have made it onto the larger exchanges, such as NASDAQ, King said.

Although Israeli companies are well-represented on NASDAQ, an American high-tech stock exchange, they have faced a high failure rate there, he said.

A lot of Israeli companies have met the minimum NASDAQ listing requirements, but they are too small for the analyst and investor communities in the United States, so their liquidity drops, and in weeks they become what are called 'orphan' companies, King said. "They then drop below the minimum share price and subsequently get de-listed from the NASDAQ."

The TSX offers these small companies another alternative. Divided into two tiers, the TSX is made up of the Toronto Stock Exchange, the senior capital marketplace for later-stage companies, and the junior Venture Exchange, which is for earlier-stage companies. The Venture Exchange gives businesses the option to start out in a smaller market and then graduate to a larger one.

"What this does is give companies access to North American capital, give them access to liquidity and an investor base, and as they continue to grow, it gives them the chance for a secondary listing on, say, the NASDAQ," King said. "The North American visibility is important. NASDAQ knows that we are the place to come to for growth companies."

Currently, about 60 high-tech companies are inter-listed on TSX and NASDAQ.

The TSX is the third-largest player in the North American stock exchange system – after the New York Stock Exchange and NASDAQ – and 40 per cent of the trading that takes place on the TSX senior exchange derives from a U.S. investor base.

The TSX is currently targeting more established Israeli businesses for the senior exchange and is looking at cross-listing opportunities with the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (TASE).

"We are looking at signing a memorandum of understanding with the TASE to do more cross and dual-listing in the future," King said.

Once investors on the TSX gain confidence in Israeli listings, King said, the exchange intends to bring earlier stage companies to its junior market, which includes companies well beyond the startup stage but not huge.

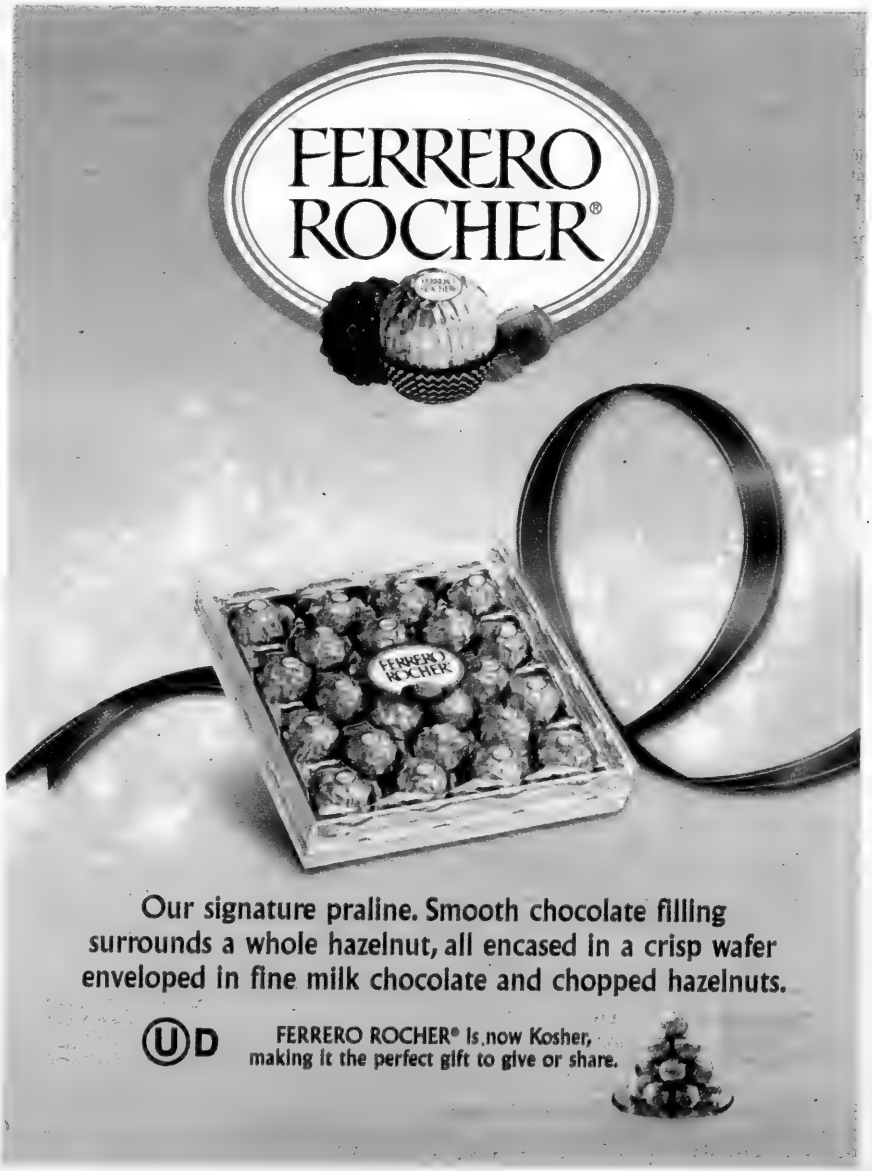
The TSX isn't interested in early-stage startups, King said. "This is not a market for startup companies."

He said that Canadian investors are eager to support Israeli companies.

"There is a natural tie-in between Canada and Israel, especially when it comes to clean tech. While Israel has had to develop ways to conserve its limited natural resources, we in Canada have always been cognizant that we live in a huge country with a huge natural resources base and we have always wanted to conserve that," he said.

"We share a green-thinking mindset. It is our intention, through the interaction and dialoguing that we have initiated to build a robust, professional relationship around these shared values."

According to King, the hope is to launch the IPO process for several Israeli companies at the Eilat-Eilot International Renewable Energy Conference in Eilat on Feb. 16 to 18, 2010. The TSX is sponsoring the conference and will send a delegation of investment bankers and lawyers headed by the TSX's CEO Tom Kloet.



North American volunteers for Israel: 'no one knows about us'

By RALPH LOWENSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Over the years, veterans of Aliyah Bet (who helped immigrants to Mandatory Palestine evade the British blockade) and Machal (volunteers from overseas who fought in Israel's War of Independence) have one common refrain: "No one in North America knows about us, and Israel pretends we never existed."

There is some truth and much misunderstanding about both statements.

We were and are largely unknown in the United States and Canada. Out of a population of more than five million Jews, we numbered only 1,250. It is safe to say that few North American Jews know about the volunteers. During my own lifetime, no American Jew or Christian who discovered that I had volunteered for Israel in 1948 had ever met another American Jew who did the same. The odds against their knowing someone like me are about 4,000 to 1.

Immediately after the 1948 war, there was absolutely no publicity about our experience. All American volunteers had violated the terms of their passports, and perhaps other laws then extant, risking at best fines and jail time, and at worst loss of their citizenship. Canadian laws, if applied strictly, could punish volunteers from that country severely.

Israel's first fighter squadron 101 of which Syd Cohen, standing second from left, of South Africa, was the commander.

We did not want publicity.

Yet, pound for pound, American and Canadian Jews contributed more to building the rock-solid foundation of the Israeli armed forces than any other volunteer group. Consider these facts.

• The first man to hold the rank of aluf (general) in the Israeli army was David (Mickey) Marcus, a West Point graduate with a brilliant World War II record. He wrote the Israeli army's first field manual and directed the battle to open the way to surrounded Jerusalem. He was tragically killed by one of his own sentries.

• The first man to hold the equivalent rank of admiral was Paul Shulman of New York City. Shulman was an Annapolis graduate and directed the purchase of most of the 12 Aliyah Bet (clandestine immigration) ships purchased in the U.S. to rescue Holocaust survivors. He was the first commander of the Israeli navy.

• Al Schwimmer of Bridgeport, Conn., was second-in-command of the Israeli air force. He directed the purchase of all the heavy aircraft that provided the air bridge to bring arms from Czechoslovakia to Israel. Without that air bridge to bring in huge amounts of rifles, machine guns, ammunition and fighter planes, Israel might not have won the war. Schwimmer later founded and led Israel Aircraft Industries, Israel's largest employer, with 20,000 employees.

• Ben Dunkelman, a Canadian with combat command experience in World War II, was brigadier of the 7th Brigade, one of Israel's 12 fighting brigades.

• Syd Cohen of South Africa, who had considerable combat experience flying in the northern desert of Africa, became the commander of the first fighter squadron (101) in the Israeli air force after the first commander Modi Allon died in an airplane crash.

• Some 59 per cent of all the 186 pilots in the air force with World War II experience were American and Canadian. These experienced fighter pilots halted the Arab bombing of Israeli cities; they played a key role in stopping the advance of Egyptian armoured columns as they neared Tel Aviv.

• Rudy Augarten of Philadelphia, a Harvard student, shot down three enemy planes, trained Israel's first sabra fighter pilots, then was brought back to Israel in 1950 with the rank of lieutenant-colonel to become commander of Ramat David Air Force Base.

• Israel's entire heavy bomber squadron came from America and was piloted mostly by Americans.

• All five fighting ships in the Israeli navy were purchased in America, initially as Aliyah Bet ships. Americans and Canadians with World War II experience trained Israeli crews in command and maintenance.

• Exodus 1947, the ship credited with tipping the 1947 United Nations Partition vote in favour of Israel, had a Palestinian Jewish captain, but a mostly-American volunteer crew.

• The 10 American "big ships" that ran the British naval blockade between the end of World War II and May 15, 1948, brought to Palestinian waters 43 per cent of all the Holocaust survivors rescued in that period of time. The ships were purchased by American philanthropists. The crews were mostly American and Canadian.

Most who came to help had combat experience

Syd Cohen

Most of the American and Canadian volunteers in the Israeli armed forces had World War II experience, and could contribute badly needed military skills to Israel. The clandestine recruitment process sought young men and women from the ages of 20 to 26 – old enough to have had military experience, but not old enough to be burdened with responsibility for spouses and children.

Our parents were not among the movers and shakers in American Jewish life. With only one or two exceptions, we were first-generation Jews on at least one side of our family. Our fathers had not yet "made it." In my research, I found only four volunteers from Ivy League schools. The Jewish representation in the student body at Columbia University was significant in 1948, perhaps as high as 20 to 30 per cent. Yet I was the only undergraduate at Columbia to volunteer.

Only two published novels were written by volunteers about their experience; neither was a bestseller.

The non-fiction books over the years about this general subject concentrated on the effort to rescue Holocaust survivors or acquire arms for Israel, not on the critical role of the volunteers, including some Christians, in actual combat service. The one exception to this was I Am My Brother's Keeper, by Craig and Jeffrey Weiss, a book that gave many vignettes of Machal experience.

In short, we were never "forgotten," because we were never known in the first place.

American veterans of Aliyah Bet and Machal have criticized Israel for not giving more public credit to these North American contributions.

But I think that in making such criticism, we fail to take the larger perspective. We fail to see ourselves as Israelis see us.

First, Palestinian Jews suffered the brunt of Arab attacks, beginning in November 1947, well before Machal volunteers were anything but a trickle. By the end of the war, in March 1949, some 4,000 Israeli soldiers and 2,000 civilians had been killed, a staggering one per cent of the population.

Second, Israel did not want to give us publicity that might have affected our lives in America and Canada adversely. Following the war, almost a dozen Americans involved in arms transfer and/or service in the Israeli armed forces were tried, fined (in one case imprisoned) and lost their civil rights for life.

Third, Israel treated us not as arriving saviours, but as arriving immigrants, just like immigrants streaming into the country from the displaced persons' camps of Europe and the internment camps in Cyprus. We were given citizenship documents, along with our enlistment assignments. Not counting several hundred thousand Holocaust survivors, we were 1,250 of some 3,500 volunteers from 44 different countries. I think Israelis expected most of us to stay, and were disappointed when we did not. Only about 200 North Americans (16 per cent) remained in Israel immediately after the war, although many others immigrated to Israel in their later years.

Israelis 'were not alone'

Fourth, Israel was involved in nation building. It had to form a cohesive citizenry out of a disparate mass. It needed local, not foreign, heroes as models to inspire Israeli youth.

And fifth, the war did not end for Israel in March 1949. The country has been harassed every day of its first six decades by a succession of enemies determined to undo the victory of 1948 – Fedayeen, the Palestine Liberation Organization, Hezbollah, Hamas, every one of the 22 Arab nations, a politicized United Nations, suicide bombers, academic and economic boycotts, and European nations that have forgotten their sordid history of anti-Semitism and fratricide. Since the armistice that was signed in March 1949, Israel has been engaged in five additional wars for survival of the Jewish state. Israel does not have the luxury of breaking out the flag on Independence Day, watching the parades and looking back at the brave foreign volunteers who helped them to victory in just one of their many wars.

Even so, Israelis of the 1948-49 generation understood and appreciated the contribution of American and Canadian volunteers. Former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin later wrote of us: "You came to us when we needed you most, during those difficult, uncertain days in our War of Independence. You gave us not only your experience, but your lives as well. The people of Israel and the State of Israel will never forget, and will always cherish, this unique contribution made by you – the volunteers of Machal."

In May 2007, Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi, the newly appointed chief of Israel's General Staff, wrote to Harold Simon, chairman of World Machal: "We owe a great deal of Israel's success to Machal and its volunteers. Machal and its volunteers were also among the founders and early trainers of the Israel Defence Forces, and, as the 19th chief of the General Staff, I never allow myself to forget who were the people who made it all happen."

An Israeli army colonel once said to me, about the role of American and Canadian volunteers: "We knew we were not alone."

Israel cannot be blamed for giving too little publicity to this handful of volunteers. But American and Canadian Jewry can be. While five million North American Jews were cheering for Israel and providing the financial and political support that Israel needed so desperately, 1,250 of their sons and daughters were putting their citizenship and lives on the line so there could be a Jewish nation where all of our brethren, now and in the future, could find refuge, if necessary.

In risking their citizenship, as well as their lives, the American and Canadian volunteers were unique. In rescuing Holocaust survivors in such large numbers, American and Canadian volunteers were unique. In air-lifting rifles, machine guns and ammunition to weapons-starved Israel in such vast numbers, American and Canadian volunteers were unique. In providing the greatest numbers of pilots for bombers and fighter planes that helped turn back the Egyptian advance on Tel Aviv, the North Americans were unique.

But American Jewish historians and museum directors, who should know better, have ignored the role that American Jews and Christians played in combat roles in 1948. It's as if a history of American involvement in World War II could be complete with a review of military production in the U.S. and the successful sale of War Bonds – but without mention of the Normandy invasion. The American Veterans of Israel tried for years to convince every major American Jewish museum to devote just one permanent museum case to the role of American and Canadian volunteers – to no avail.

The two museums – one in Florida and another in California – and a web site (www.machal.org.il) that we surviving veterans have built with our own funds and with the help of a few caring foundations are efforts to fill in this shocking gap in North American Jewish knowledge about the War of Independence. We are proud of what we did in the 1948 war, and we believe our fellow North American Jews would be, also – if only they knew.

Guide dogs can change people's lives

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Guy Simchi, who has been coping with blindness for five years, said that his guide dog, Turner, doesn't just help him get from point A to point B, he helps him remain a part of society.

Simchi, a social worker at the Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind (IGDCB) – a non-profit organization that works to improve the quality of life of the visually impaired by providing them with trained guide dogs – and a graduate of the program, said that becoming involved with the centre three years ago changed his life.

"In Hebrew, the word kelev, which means dog, can also be interpreted as like a heart," said Simchi, who lost his sight five years ago as a result of complications from diabetes.

"Turner is my eyes, and I think sight is one of the greatest senses that we have... He's not just taking me from place to place. He's taking my heart with him. Turner brought me back to society."

Until Simchi graduated from the IGDCB program and was paired with Turner, he walked with a white cane.

"I think people were afraid of my cane. They wouldn't come close to me, they wouldn't talk to me. If they did, they would just hold my hand and offer their help. I felt very lonely and I felt handicapped," said Simchi, who was in Toronto earlier this month to raise awareness about the organization.

"Then I had Turner, and when I started walking with him, people started coming up to me and wanted to pet him. Through him, I could talk to them and be part of society again."

Located in Rehovot, Israel, near Tel Aviv, IGDCB, the only centre of its kind in Israel, was founded in 1991 by Noach Braun, the centre's director.

From 1953 to 1970, Dr. Rudolphina Menzel, an Israeli psychologist and dog trainer, provided blind Israelis with guide dogs, but when she died in 1970, so did the service.

'Turner taught me to be a good friend'

Until IGDCB was founded more than two decades later, the only way a blind Israeli could receive a guide dog was to attend classes in an American training centre.

Only those who spoke fluent English and could leave their families behind for a month could take advantage of this opportunity. If someone did receive a guide dog from overseas and a problem arose later on, there was no system in place to provide assistance.

Braun was in his 20s, working with animals on an Israeli wildlife reserve, when he learned about this and knew that something needed to be done.

"I said, 'No way. We need to change that.' It's easy to say, but it's much harder to start a non-profit organization in Israel."

Now in his 40s, Braun is still focused on improving the facility, raising awareness about the organization and helping visually impaired Israelis.

Braun said there are about 26,000 blind Israelis, but the potential for guide dog ownership is in the hundreds, because there are a number of limitations, such as age, that make people ineligible.

Since the organization was founded, about 330 people have been partnered with a guide dog. About 30 partnerships are made each year, but Braun hopes to increase the number to 40 to help address the year-long waiting list.

"We just purchased another piece of land. We have a program to expand to have more kennels and facilities... It's a big project that will cost around $1 million," he said, adding that all are welcome to come visit the centre, meet the program participants and the dogs, which are bred and trained at the centre.

"We are not magicians... but with [these partnerships] we change people's lives."

Only eight per cent of the agency's $1.4-million (US) budget comes from the Israeli government. The IGDCB is supported almost entirely by private donations from individuals, foundations and organizations.

The centre relies on help from international offices like the one in Toronto, that promote fundraising initiatives to help keep the organization afloat, such as the guide dog sponsorship program.

IGDCB proposes that this program be chosen as a mitzvah project, for which bar or bat mitzvah students take on a Jewish community service activity to supplement their studies. As this is common among bar mitzvah-age students in North America, Braun hopes that they'll consider his centre when working to raise money for a worthy cause.

Simchi, who works for and benefits from the centre, understands the impact the program has on the lives of blind people and their families.

As a married man with two young children, Simchi said being a father is very important to him.

He said that when his son, Daniel, who is now 4-1/2 years old, started going to preschool, it was around the time he started walking with a white cane.

"I wanted to be a good father and take my son to [school] like every other father was doing. I learned how to walk to the kindergarten, I took him on my back in a basket and I walked with my cane."

He said when they arrived, the teacher would meet him outside and take Daniel from him, and when he came to pick him up, the teacher would bring Daniel to him.

"I never got to meet his friends. I never knew about anything there that happened with his friends," Simchi recalled.

"But the first time I came with Turner, I was standing in the yard and I was waiting for Daniel's teacher to bring him to me. Meanwhile, I think half the children in the kindergarten surrounded me, and they wanted to pet him."

He said when the kids learned that he was Daniel's father, they began telling him stories about all the things they did with Daniel, how they played together, which made Simchi feel more informed and involved in his son's life.

"It was an amazing experience. When Daniel came and saw all his friends surrounding me, he was so happy."

This, he said, is just one example of the positive impact that Turner has had on his life.

"Turner taught me how to be a good friend. I think I knew it before, but not like I know it today... It's amazing to feel what Turner gives me and it immediately gives you the feelings that you want to give back."

A sea change in 20 years

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

The English author L.P. Hartley once wrote: "The past is a foreign country: they do things differently there."

That's how I feel whenever I look back at the way that the world – in particular, the Jewish world in central and eastern Europe – worked before the collapse of communism 20 years ago. The changes triggered when the Berlin Wall came down have produced a host of new and complex challenges that Jews in Europe have had to confront.

But as Robert Djerassi, a leader of the Bulgarian Jewish community, put it recently: "When I think back to Socialist days, even everyday experiences sound so improbable and grotesque that it's hard sometimes to convince people who didn't live through them that they actually took place."

The Jews of Eastern Europe

I lived and worked as a journalist in Communist countries from the late 1970s onward, first as a correspondent for United Press International and then as an independent reporter, for JTA and others, as well as the author of several books on the region. It was in the late 1980s that I began dedicating much of my writing to Jewish subjects, just as communism was collapsing and new democratic freedoms allowed Jews to reassert and reclaim their identity and forge a new beginning in what before the Holocaust had been Europe's Jewish heartland.

Under communism in most countries in the region, the practice of Judaism and the expression of Jewishness were semi-clandestine, almost secret, almost taboo.

Leaders of the Jewish communities in these countries were beholden to the regime and generally toed the party line. Less than a year after the fall of communism, a rabbi in Prague was forced to resign after admitting that he had been a police informer under the Communists.

All Communist states except Romania had broken ties with Israel after the Six Day War in 1967. And in most countries, Jewish practice and education, even the study of Hebrew, was strictly limited or even barred.

In Prague, for example, the scholarly publication of what was then the State Jewish Museum was published in English and French and other languages – but not in Czech, in order to limit access by local people. And many Jews I interviewed were unwilling to speak to me on the record, even on a subject such as the restoration of a monument to victims of the Holocaust.

"We had to get authorization from the authorities to speak with foreign visitors, and then afterward we had to write out reports on our conversations, whether it be with visiting scholars, journalists or whatever," a Prague Jewish museum curator told me in 1990. "It was the pressure of a totalitarian regime."

In Warsaw in the early 1980s, I was part of a group called the Jewish Flying University that consisted of young Jews and non-Jews who tried to teach themselves – on their own – about Jewish rituals, traditions, history and culture. The group "flew" from apartment to apartment for meetings.

Western Jews like myself were conduits to the outside world, despite the limits of our knowledge.

"You're a real Jew," they told me, even though I don't keep kosher, go to services much or speak Hebrew. "You've known all your life that you are Jewish."

November 1989 saw a climax of change in eastern Europe that had been coming for months.

Already that summer a negotiated settlement in Poland had led to free elections. And in September, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee had officially returned to Hungary after 36 years, and Hungary and Israel had resumed formal diplomatic relations.

Nov. 12 of that year found me in Prague sitting with a small group of eager yet anxious Jews in the top floor function room of the historic Jewish Town Hall. The Berlin Wall had come down three days earlier, but the Velvet Revolution that ousted the Communist regime in Prague was still five days away.

We were there to meet with Edgar Bronfman, then president of the World Jewish Congress, who was making his first official visit to the country.

I saw fear, hope and excitement on people's faces.

"The winds of freedom are blowing across the world like a gale," Bronfman declared. "I don't like to use the word 'democracy,' but prefer to say that there is a new era dawning on everyone that people won't be governed without their consent.

"It is important that the Jewish people in eastern Europe are beginning to feel closer together," he went on.

"It is heartbreakingly sad that there are so few Jews left, [but] the Jewish world will go from strength to strength. We have a mission – to teach others the way of the Lord."

Bronfman concluded: "Freedom is blowing, blowing for all of us." It was an emotional moment at the cusp of the unknown: if the past is a foreign country, so is the future.

Now out of the shadows

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

Eastern Europe's Jews have come out of the shadows.

When the Cold War ended 20 years ago with the fall of the Berlin Wall, the Velvet Revolution in Czechoslovakia and the eventual collapse of the Soviet Union, Jewish communities in the region were small, weak and generally veiled.

The Jews of Eastern Europe

Now Jewish life, culture, religious practice and ethnic identity are part of the contemporary mosaic – often unabashedly so.

"When I began working in Poland in 1990, it was almost completely taboo to tell your friends that you were Jewish," said Poland's American-born chief rabbi, Michael Schudrich. "Today, it is just a normal thing to say to almost anybody here in Poland. What was taboo only 20 years ago is today a curiosity or interesting or, for some, of no consequence at all."

The fall of communism two decades ago sparked a burst of energy and optimism among European Jews as newly democratic European countries instituted religious freedoms and restored broken ties with Israel.

Israeli, American and other western Jewish groups fuelled a host of programs aimed at reviving Jewish life in the region and helping build Jewish schools, institutions and religious congregations.

The eastward expansion of the European Union in 2004 and 2007 formally abolished the East-West frontier that for decades had divided postwar Europe and its Jews.

Today there are Jewish clubs, theatre groups, publications, blogs and even Facebook groups – in addition to active synagogues, culture festivals and an alphabet soup of Jewish organizations that coordinate everything from communal welfare to pro-Israel lobbying.

But nearly a full generation after the end of communism, some of the excitement has faded and many of the old challenges remain. Despite new income from property restitution and nascent local fundraising, few eastern European Jewish communities are self-sufficient. Many remain tiny and weak, and others are beset by conflict.

"Ironically, one development of post-Communist Jewish life was not simply the revival of Jewish communal life but often of multiple and even competing – or some might say feuding – community organizations," said Rabbi Andrew Baker, the American Jewish Committee's director for international Jewish affairs.

In 2004, he recalled, a power struggle between two rabbis in Vilnius that boiled over into fistfights and prompted the closure of the synagogue.

In 2005, threats and lawsuits launched against each other by two Jewish communal organizations in Zagreb, Croatia, made banner headlines. And a hotly contested Jewish community election in Prague saw fisticuffs between supporters of rival sides.

"I would sometimes joke that this open fighting was proof that authentic Jewish life had returned," Baker said.

Meanwhile, new challenges have emerged: the global economic crisis, the rise of anti-Semitic far-right parties in some countries, the impact of Muslim immigrant communities and virulent anti-Israel sentiment that sometimes spills over into anti-Semitism.

On many levels, the difference between East and West remains huge, according to Jonathan Joseph, president of the European Council of Jewish Communities, a network linking Jewish community groups in about 40 countries.

"During the boom years, it may have appeared that everything had elided together, but this is illusory," Joseph said.

Rabbi Michael Schudrich

"The economies of these countries are still desperately thin, and if the West has had bad economic influenza, the eastern countries have had double pneumonia."

Jewish communities across Europe are working together on key social welfare and education projects, particularly in former Communist states, he said, adding that "bad times make bad internationalists, and there has been a lot of turning inwards."

The situation differs from country to country, depending on local politics, the state of local democratic institutions and economic factors, as well as on the size, activity and critical mass of local Jewish communities.

Change has come

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

The Jews of Eastern Europe

Covering the development of Jewish life in Europe in the 20 years since the fall of communism, I have witnessed many landmark moments.

Among them are many firsts – the first rabbis to take up their posts, the first bar mitzvahs and Jewish weddings in decades, the first new synagogues, the first kosher restaurants, the first Jewish schools.

There were also the first conflicts between Reform and Orthodox, between young generations and the establishment and between rival Jewish factions struggling for communal power.

Sometimes the symbolism was overwhelming: Jewish life and free expression of Jewish identity were re-emerging in the one-time Jewish heartland, in countries whose Jewish populations had been decimated by the Holocaust and where a Jewish presence was long considered a closed chapter of history.

The image it often conjured up for me was of fragile tendrils emerging through ashes.

Over time the tendrils took hold. The new life they represent is still delicate and needs a lot of nurturing – financial and otherwise. Eastern Europe's emerging Jewish communities face internal and external challenges, and it's doubtful that many of the tiny far-flung communities ultimately will survive.

But, generally, eastern European Jewish life is here to stay. That was not at all apparent before the collapse of the Iron Curtain.

In Warsaw in the early 1980s, when I first met the Jewish author and journalist Konstanty Gebert, the sense was that there was no future for Jews in eastern Europe.

"I believe we are the last ones. Definitely," Gebert once told an interviewer.

Recently, however, Gebert heralded Polish Jewish life, present and future.

"There is a bar mitzvah in my shul next week. The yearly Festival of Jewish Culture in Krakow is just around the corner. Midrasz, the Jewish magazine, comes to my mailbox regularly late, as always," he wrote in a recently published essay. "My younger son graduated from the city's Jewish school. My older son was press spokesman of the Warsaw kehillah for some time. My invitation for the Israeli Independence Day reception just came in."

In Prague, where the affiliated Jewish community numbers at least 1,600 and the various Jewish denominations have five active synagogues, I remember the intensity of emotion at a 1992 ceremony when Rabbi Karol Sidon, a writer and one-time anti-Communist dissident, was inaugurated formally as the city's rabbi.

'A huge potential'

About 150,000 Jews are believed to live in the countries of east-central Europe, excluding states that were part of the former Soviet Union, such as Russia and Ukraine.

Of these, Hungary has the largest Jewish population by far, with an estimated 100,000 Jews, nearly all in Budapest and only a small fraction of them affiliated.

Jewish activists in Budapest say that many problems exist despite a plethora of Jewish groups, more than a dozen active synagogues and a burgeoning new Jewish youth culture.

Mircea Cernov, who heads Haver, a new foundation in Budapest that aims to promote dialogue and educate young Jews and non-Jews about Jewish culture, heritage, history and religion, says there are few real leaders who can move the community forward.

"Is there a huge potential?" he said. "Yes. The question is, what next?"

What's next, in Hungary and other countries, will depend on the young generation of Jews who can scarcely remember the world as it was before 1989. Many young Jews reject a Jewish identity based on the Holocaust or anti-Semitism.

Some have embraced religious observance, others seek new ways of Jewish identification. Still others are assimilating.

Many who are engaged Jewishly travel widely and network on the Internet, forging links across the continent and overseas, maintaining close ties with Israel but preferring to remain in Europe.

'New generation will emerge'

It was the eve of Rosh Hashanah, and a standing-room crowd filled the opulent sanctuary of the ornate Jubilee Synagogue.

"All my life I've been moving in a circle toward the inauguration," Rabbi Sidon had told me a few days earlier. "People do things unconsciously. They don't always consciously decide what to do. Their subconscious leads them to it."

Rabbi Sidon was born in 1942 to a Jewish father who died in the Terezin concentration camp and a gentile mother who survived the war.

As an adult, Rabbi Sidon formally converted and escaped to Germany, where he studied Judaism in the 1980s before completing his rabbinical studies in Israel.

Rabbi Sidon, who is Orthodox, is still Prague's chief rabbi, though he was ousted briefly in 2005 during bitter infighting between Jewish community factions.

Peter Gyori, the deputy chair of the Federation of Czech Jewish Communities, remembers the bad old days when almost anything Jewish was suppressed or suspect.

"I remember when all of us would be hiding in one synagogue and leaving in a way that no one would spot us," said Gyori, who is also the head of the non-Orthodox Beit Praha.

"We live now in the luxury of fighting among various communities and groups," he said. "And not going to this or that synagogue."

The Jews of Eastern Europe

In July 1995, Prague was the scene of another first – the first conference since the Holocaust that was dedicated to planning strategy for the future of European Jews. It may seem odd to single out a conference as one of the key moments of Jewish development in post-Communist Europe. But this one, called Planning for the Future of European Jewry, was in fact a landmark.

The three-day meeting aimed to assert, for the first time, that European Jews could control their future, an idea that was inconceivable before 1989.

The conference drew 200 Jewish community leaders, policymakers and scholars from 25 countries across Europe, East and West, as well as the United States and Israel.

Participants included Orthodox and secular Jews, rabbis and laypeople. Many, meeting for the first time, forged networks that persist to this day.

The meeting was the first international forum to identify and outline many of the issues that have since dominated the European Jewish policy agenda: relations between Diaspora Jews and Israel; how to define Jewish identity and what constitutes a Jewish community; anti-Semitism and interfaith activities; the relationship of Jews to Europe and how to reach out to the unaffiliated.

Speaking at the meeting, Gebert described the Jews of post-Communist Europe as "shipwrecked Jews" who were struggling to reclaim a Jewish identity that had been submerged under communism, and in many cases did not know which way to turn.

The conference was an exciting moment – the first formal occasion in which the concept of a post-Communist, pan-European identity was broached.

Ruth Ellen Gruber at her grandmother's grave in Radauti in the Bucovina region of northern Romania.

As such it reflected the energy and optimism that exploded after the fall of communism and led many observers to dub the 1990s "the Jewish decade."

Czech President Vaclav Havel, whose first foreign trip after becoming president in 1989 was to Israel, met with participants of the conference.

"I believe Jews will continue to live a life of their own," he said, "and that new generations will emerge."

An old synagogue revived in St. Polten, Austria

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

For the past 70 years, no prayers have echoed solemnly inside the sanctuary of the Ehemalige Synagogue in St. Polten, Austria. A heavy hush has lain over the stones of this war-ravaged and century-worn house of worship. Only recently has the Mah Tovu prayer recited on entering a shul once again resonated through the entirely restored Ehemalige.

Revived from a blitzkrieg of Nazi violations and restored to its original majesty reminiscent of the Art Nouveau movement, the Ehemalige Synagogue, originally constructed in 1913, stands today as a symbol of what Austrians have essentially lost, writ large in the texture of its rich ornamental designs and splendid stained glass windows.

St. Polten, the hub of the State of Lower Austria, is located about 40 miles (60 kilometres) west of Vienna. From the 1850s onward, its Jewish citizenry built a dynamic community, thriving under the benevolent rule of Austria's Emperor Franz Joseph I. Much loved by his subjects, it was he who bestowed equality of rights on the Jewish population in 1867.

But soon after the Nazi Anschluss of March 12, 1938, the demise of Austria's Jews was set in motion. During the rampages of Kristallnacht on Nov. 9 and 10, 1938, synagogues across the country were nearly obliterated.

In St. Polten, the destruction of the Jewish community's spiritual centre was accompanied by political songs, blared out as its central Star of David was yanked from the overhead dome, windows were shattered, Torah scrolls, Ark benches, chairs, tables and pictures burned. A once glinting Art Deco chandelier was torn down. The cantor's office was vandalized, books and manuscripts thrown onto the street, soaked in petrol and set alight.

During most of World War II, the Ehemalige served the Nazis as a detention camp for Russian civilians and a transfer station for Russian prisoners. In the war's final days, the building's condition deteriorated as a result of air raid damage, degenerating gradually into disrepair. The domed roof was severely damaged, and some structural components threatened to collapse. The windows were boarded up, although rain and snow still penetrated through the cracks. In advanced deterioration by the late 1970s, the synagogue was fated to be torn down for a parking lot.

The interior of the synagogue today

Then local historian Martha Keil spearheaded a drive to save the structure. Her efforts succeeded. The federal Department for Historical Monuments stepped in to declare the Ehemalige a national historical monument.

The process of large-scale renovations began in the summer of 1980 and were completed in 1984.

St. Polten's synagogue signifies many things. It is both a reawakening, recalling the country's role in a terrible period of history, and a reaffirmation of the indomitable will of the Jewish People.

Religious services now unlikely

Keil, the current director of the Institute for Jewish History in Austria, opened in 1988 and housed in the Ehemalige Synagogue, says: "For me, it is a beautiful shell which lost its spirit because of hate and violence, so I feel the duty to make a tikkun olam (repairing the world), to heal at least a few wounds by keeping the memory alive and by bringing Jewish people to this place. especially descendants of St. Polten's Jews. It is a space of commemoration and encounter."

The Institute (see: www.injoest.ac.at), located on Dr.-Karl-Renner-Promenade, has a staff of seven in addition to Keil (who is not Jewish), conducting research, publishing historical articles and offering lectures in adult education programs and schools to combat anti-Semitism, prejudice and misinformation.

Although the nearby Jewish cemetery is also maintained by the city authorities, it is unlikely that religious services will ever again be held at the Ehemalige Synagogue. There are just too few Jews here. Of a pre-1938 population of 1,250, only five Jews remain today.

Inscribed into the white stone of the outside gable of the Ehemalige Synagogue are the Hebrew words: "Open for me the gates of righteousness; I will enter and give thanks to the Lord" (Psalm 118). Yet, the synagogue's current raison d'être is to house the Institute for the History of the Jews in Austria, a museum. The bygone bimah has been transformed into a centre stage for concert performances.

The synagogue in ruins in 1941

"As the mural stencils of the patterns of the cupola had been rediscovered, the cupola could be reproduced in all its beauty," Keil explains, adding that the original windows, however, could not be salvaged.

Thus the poignancy of the moment was not lost on a capacity audience when Marion Rabinowitz, an American with roots in St. Polten, recently raised her voice to sing the Mah Tovu at the Ehemalige Synagogue, marking the 20th anniversary of the synagogue's phoenix-like restoration.

Attendance at the event, estimated at about 300 people, included such dignitaries as Dan Ashbel, Israel's ambassador to Austria and Slovenia; Lower Austria's finance minister, Wolfgang Sobotka; St. Polten's mayor, and other local community leaders. The occasion was extensively covered by the national media and taped for broadcast on Austrian television.

For the Rabinowitz family who took part in the commemoration, just being there was an emotion-laden experience, not only because Marion so brilliantly vocalized the Mah Tovu (the prayer expressing veneration for synagogues not sung within the cavernous hall of the synagogue since the time of Kristallnacht), but also because it was at this house of worship (once encompassing a congregation of about 700) that their grandfather, Philipp Wolf Rabinowitz, served as cantor from 1899 to 1921. Because anti-Semitism was almost ubiquitous in Austria after World War I, Jews began streaming out of the country. Cantor Rabinowitz left in 1923, moving his family to the United States.

"I spoke first to thank all those who have paid such tribute to the cherished memories of those Jews who came through those doors to pray, sing and celebrate life," Marion says from her home in Marlborough, Mass., near Boston. "I was honoured to speak about my family. I tried not to think of how the place must have looked when the Nazis took over the building, burning and smashing everything."

No Torah, but a sense of prayer nevertheless

The office of the Institute for Jewish History in Austria holds special significance for Marion's brother, Phil. "There is documentation that my grandfather lived in the back of the synagogue," he notes. "It was surreal for me being in this magnificent sanctuary that looks as it did when it was built. I felt faint as a multitude of thoughts filled my mind."

The exterior of the synagogue

He was accompanied by his wife, Marilyn, and his twin brother, Louis; and the return of Rabinowitz family to the Ehemalige Synagogue was a homecoming and a closure.

Phil, 67, who lives in Highland Park, N.J., points out that his paternal grandfather wasn't the only ancestor to sing in the synagogue. His father, Emil, who passed away several years ago at 98, also sang in the congregation's choir. Phil recalls a story that when the synagogue was built, Emperor Franz Joseph came to the dedication where his father, then aged nine, sang in the choir for him.

"So as Marion sang Mah Tovu, it was awesome," Phil says. "The Israeli ambassador was stunned when she began the prayer. The entire hall sat in a reverential silence."

The acoustics are superb, declares Marion, who was born in New York City. "I could only imagine my grandfather's booming voice, as described many times by our father, singing the beautiful prayers. I was and am glad I sang the Mah Tovu that evening as it was a special honour to the memory of their community."

And although the Ehemalige Synagogue contains no Torah, Marion says she nonetheless felt as though she was entering a place of prayer. "Seeing my brothers put on their kippahs brought a sense of sanctity there, coupled with the stone artwork around the Ark and the Ten Commandments etched above it." She believes that the Ehemalige Synagogue represents a powerful visual symbol of the country's Jewish past.

"There is no other building comparable to it," she remarks. "St. Polten was fortunate in that its synagogue was somehow spared irreparable damage over years of negligence. And as the interest in Jewish history has grown, so, too, has the institute become a focus of the cultural landscape of the region."

Keil, who has a degree in Jewish studies from a Vienna university and lectures across Europe on Jewish history, does not boast that she is the synagogue's saviour. She calls the campaign to resurrect the edifice a collaborative effort involving Viennese art historian Karl Gutkas and Hans Morgenstern, one of the city's few Jewish returnees, and financially supported by the Austrian monument preservation office, the government of Lower Austria and the city of St. Polten.

"We are the housekeepers, so to speak, looking after the old synagogue," nods Keil. "We try to bring some Jewish culture to the house, although we have hardly any means to do this. For St. Polten it is a witness to the destruction of a once vibrant Jewish community."

U.S., Israel closing gaps on Iran and peacemaking

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Israel and the United States seem closer than they have been for months on two key issues: peacemaking with the Palestinians and Iranian nuclear ambitions.

The point was hammered home with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's announcement of a 10-month freeze on building in West Bank settlements and strong White House censure of Iran's plans to build 10 new uranium enrichment plants.

But important differences of nuance remain on both fronts. Israel would like to see more robust action on Iran without delay, and the United States wants Israel to make further substantial peace overtures to the Palestinians.

The latest escalation in tension between Iran and the international community came after the International Atomic Energy Agency demanded that the Islamic Republic immediately halt enrichment at a previously secret site near the holy city of Qom, and outgoing IAEA director Mohammed ElBaradei declared that he could not confirm that Iran did not have a nuclear weapons program.

The strongly worded IAEA motion of censure was endorsed by Russia and China, two powers that in the past have tended to steer clear of tough measures against Iran.

Release of prisoners to Hamas could weaken Abbas

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas

Iran responded with contempt. Rather than close down the facility at Qom, it would start building five new ones over the next few months, and accelerate plans for another five in their wake. The Iranian parliament urged reduced co-operation with IAEA inspectors, and there was even talk of Iran withdrawing from the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty – moves that would give it a free hand to pursue a nuclear weapons program without international scrutiny.

Israeli pundits say the Iranian threats are intended to test international resolve in the hope of getting an improved offer from the United States and other major powers: permission to enrich uranium to industrial grade on Iranian soil rather than in France and Russia.

But this time, the pundits say, the Iranians may have miscalculated, and the clear White House warning that "time is running out for Iran to address the international community's growing concerns about its nuclear program" could presage the end of U.S. President Barack Obama's attempt to engage Iran and the beginning of the harsh sanctions regime Netanyahu has long advocated – with Russia and China aboard.

Indeed, when he first met Obama in 2007, before either man was in high office, Netanyahu pressed the case for strong economic sanctions against Iran. Obama, then a junior senator, picked up on this and soon afterward sponsored the Iran Sanctions Enabling Act.

During Obama and Netanyahu's latest meeting in Washington last month, Iran again was high on the agenda. Netanyahu told journalists that time would show the meeting to have been very significant – he strongly emphasized the word "very" – language some pundits took to imply that major understandings on the Iranian nuclear issue had been reached.

For now, the signs are that Obama and Netanyahu are very much on the same sanctions page, with slightly different views on the timing. The big question is what happens if sanctions fail.

Israeli pundits argue that Obama, embroiled in Iraq and Afghanistan, will not want to open a third front against Iran, while Netanyahu is not ready to take any option, including the military one, off the table.

What is clear to both leaders is that if either decides to attack Iran, Israel will become a target for Iranian retaliation. Hence the huge joint military exercise in the Negev in late October, testing Israeli and American anti-missile defence systems.

On the Palestinian front, the Americans welcomed Netanyahu's building freeze as going beyond anything previous Israeli governments had done. But at the same time, the Americans made it clear that they would have liked to have seen more – for example, a freeze that did not exclude east Jerusalem, and public buildings and housing units already started – because the object of the exercise was to get the Palestinians on board for peace talks, and only a full freeze might have achieved that aim.

The Americans also are pressing Netanyahu to free hundreds of Palestinian prisoners outside the framework of the impending deal for the release of Gilad Schalit, the Israeli corporal held by Hamas for more than three years, because of the bitter rivalry between the secular Fatah organization and the more militant Hamas. The thinking is that the standing of the U.S.-backed Fatah leader, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas could be weakened by the planned release of about 1,000 prisoners to Hamas in return for Schalit. Releasing large numbers of Fatah prisoners to Abbas would help prevent him from losing face.

The main U.S. goal, though, is to revive the stalled Israeli-Palestinian peace process, and here they believe Netanyahu could have done more – for example, by agreeing to resume talks where his predecessor, Ehud Olmert, left off, or giving the Palestinians a clearer idea of the contours of a final peace deal.

The way forward now could be new U.S. bridging proposals that do exactly that. Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak says Netanyahu's settlement freeze has made this possible, and the United States will soon present the parties with something along these lines.

The Americans, however, are well aware that with Hamas in control of Gaza, and with conflicting Israeli and Palestinian bottom lines on all the core issues, the chances of success are not high. On the other hand, the prize to be won is huge. Success would mean a pacified Middle East with enhanced American influence and prestige.

The question is, will Obama be prepared to take the risk of likely failure, with the attendant consequences for his and America's international standing?

Into the Holocaust: questions my children asked

By DAVID MEILACH
Special to The CJN

I read the French and began to translate. The moment had arrived. I had to explain the obscenity of the Holocaust to my own children.

My wife and I and our two children aged nine and 11 had become expert "flaneurs," the colloquial Parisian word which translates roughly into English as "strollers." We were exploring the back streets and narrow alleys of the 5th arrondissement of Paris, also known as the Latin Quarter. Ambling down the rue de Pontoise, a small side street that travels northward from the rue des Écoles toward the river Seine, we noticed an elementary school with an engraved granite plaque affixed to the brick wall beside the entrance way.

"What does the sign on the school say, daddy?" my nine-year-old daughter asked.

In translation, the plaque reads: "To the memory of the children, students of this school, deported from 1942 to 1944 because they were born Jews, innocent victims of Nazi barbarity with the active complicity of the Vichy government. They were exterminated in the death camps. Let us never forget them."

"Jewish children from this school were taken away from their mommies and daddies and deported, sent away, by the Nazis and killed in concentration camps during World War II," I began to explain.

"But daddy, they were just little children, they didn't do anything. Why were they killed?"

"They were Jewish children, sweetheart. That was their crime. The Nazis were attempting to destroy all the Jews of Europe."

"What are Nazis, daddy?"

"Nazis were what the German people who followed a man named Adolf Hitler were called."

"He was very bad wasn't he, daddy?

"Yes sweetheart, the worst kind"

"Daddy, do you think that Jake and I would have been exported?"

"The word is deported, sweetheart, not exported. Goods are exported, people are deported. If we had lived here in Paris during that wartime, and given that your grandpa and grandma were Jewish, yes, you might have been deported, too."

"Daddy, I don't think I would have wanted to be deported."

"Daddy, how did they kill the little children?"

"They used poison gas."

"Did it hurt?"

"I don't know, sweetheart, I hope not too much."

"Daddy, how many Jewish people were killed by the Nazis?"

"Six million Jews."

"That's a lot of people isn't it?"

"Six million too many."

"Daddy, how many Paris Jewish people were killed?"

"About 75,000 including 11,000 children. We aren't far from the old Jewish quarter of Paris in the Marais. Let's visit France's Memorial to the Shoah."

Inside the courtyard at the Memorial to the Holocaust on rue Geoffroy l'Asnier in the 4th arrondissement, a broad wall of stone has been erected upon which are inscribed the names of the 75,000 French Jews who were deported and killed during the occupation of France before it was liberated by the Allies in 1944.

My 11-year-old son was mesmerized by a name high up on the wall.

"Dad, I think you should see this. The last name, it's got one letter different, an 'I' in place of an 'A.' But it's really close to ours. What do you think?"

"I think he may have been distantly related to us. Remember, Jacob, that my grandparents, your great-grandparents, were already in the U.S. and Canada by the time World War II had begun. But the last name is almost identical to ours. Hebrew names and many Polish and Russian names were often translated and written differently when copied into different languages.

"So, this guy could have been related to us?"

"Yes, Jacob, he may well have been related to us. All six million were."

My children spent the next two hours transfixed inside the Holocaust Memorial building. As they watched multimedia presentations, the memorabilia, the displays of faded yellow stars, passports and identity papers, I tried to field the questions that the events portrayed before them engendered. It was emotionally exhausting, not only internalizing these events once again myself, but attempting to put them into language that a child could comprehend.

The last room of the museum section has its walls covered from floor to ceiling with photographs of the dead – family portraits, schoolyard photos, wedding photos, children, grandparents, brothers, husbands, wives, sisters, all lost in the abyss 65 years ago.

'Masters at never forgetting'

"Daddy, were all these people killed?"

"Yes, sweetheart, these are the photographs of the dead."

"This is a very sad place, daddy."

"Indeed, very sad."

The French are masters at never forgetting the events and the participants in those events that shaped them as a nation. The period of occupation by the Germans was a pivotal event, tantamount to the Revolution itself. On the street corners of Paris are memorial plaques to members of the resistance and other French citizens who fell before and during the liberation of Paris in 1944. On busy Boulevard Saint-Michel, a retaining wall has been left standing, untouched, complete with the bullet holes from Allied and German small arms fire. Plaques on buildings on rue des Rosiers, in the centre of the medieval Jewish Quarter acknowledge the attempted destruction of French Jewry.

Memorial plaques that honour the memories of Jewish children deported to their deaths from Paris during World War II

Interestingly, each memorial plaque entreats us to "Ne les oublions pas," "never let us forget them." Not one plaque asks us to forgive.

Israel aims to boost trade with PA

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

TEL AVIV — Haim Divon, Israel's former ambassador to Canada and currently the head of Mashav, Israel's National Agency for International Development Co-operation, recently told a large group of Palestinian women from the West Bank at a women's business conference that he hopes trade between Israel and the Palestinians will continue to increase in the near future.

The Tel Aviv conference was sponsored by Mashav and the Israeli-Palestinian Chamber of Commerce and Industry (IPCC), which was established in October 2008.

The Palestinian women, mostly Christians from the Bethlehem area and El Azariya, all received special permits from Israel to attend the conference, designed to promote economic peace between Israelis and Palestinians.

"We all feel badly when we hear about difficulties at the checkpoints," Divon said. "But we are sending a message to the international community that we are looking at ways to improve our economies."

The deputy foreign minister of Israel, Danny Ayalon of the Israel Beiteinu party, told the conference that most checkpoints in the territories have been removed by the Netanyahu government.

Ayalon called on the Arab Gulf states to "put $10 billion into the West Bank to create jobs and a new economy," which "will be a basis for a good statehood."

The Palestinian women at the conference were also welcomed by Ofer Gindelman, the former Israeli consul at the embassy in Ottawa who is currently the CEO of the IPCC.

In an interview with The CJN, Gindelman, noted that Israel benefits from trade relations with the Palestinian Authority.

"Trade between Israel and the Palestinians amounted to 15 billion shekels [more than $3.5 billion U.S] in 2008. Of that 15 billion, 80 per cent is Israeli exports to the Palestinians, while only 20 per cent is Palestinian exports to Israel. Also, of that 15 billion, 13 billion consists of trade between the West Bank and Israel and 2 billion is trade between Israel and Gaza," he said

"I expect that the amount of trade between Israel and the Palestinians will grow significantly this year, given the removal of many checkpoints, the improved security situation, and the developing Palestinian economy, among other factors," Gendelman added.

When asked why there is no Palestinian co-CEO with him at the IPCC, Gendelman responded: "We would love to have a Palestinian-Israeli Chamber of Commerce, but it is up to the Palestinian Authority to do this. We represent Israeli businesses first and foremost, but we also help Palestinian businesses that want our help. We have had a few dozen Palestinian businesses who have asked for our help, mostly in regard to security and customs issues."

For example, Gendelman, who speaks Arabic fluently, said the IPCC has been asked by the Coca-Cola company for its assistance.

"Coca-Cola in the Palestinian territories wants to import assets to clean its bottles, but the problem is that the assets could also be used to make bombs. Israel prevents dual use materials from entering the West Bank and Gaza, so they can't import it. We are trying to find another product for them that isn't dual use, so that way it is a win-win situation. We haven't yet found the solution," he said.

Haim Divon

A Palestinian woman named Fatima from Bethany expressed that female entrepreneurs are given far less support from the PA than she felt her counterparts in Israel are getting.

"In Palestine, there's nothing to support us. There is no government money in Palestine given to women who want to start businesses. There is no justice. International organizations need to hear this," she said.

Most of the Palestinian women at the event nodded their heads in agreement.

About half the women at the event were sponsored by Mashav to spend a week in Israel to undergo entrepreneurial training in Haifa.

About 20 of the Palestinian women who attended were in their 20s and were students studying at Bir Zeit University, Bethlehem University and the University of Jordan.

Ushering Israel's Arabs into the global village

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Israel21c

NAZARETH — One of Israel's richest men also happens to be one of the country's most socially aware businessmen.

Renowned for his modesty, industrialist Stef Wertheimer made billions in the metal industry and is now building his sixth technology park, this time in the Israeli Arab city of Nazareth.

Wertheimer has already built five tech parks, one in Turkey and four in Israel – including the model park Tefen, which also provides opportunities for Israel's Arab minority. But his vision for Nazareth is different. This time the park will be based inside an Israeli Arab population centre.

Nazareth, a predominantly Muslim city with a significant population of Christian Arabs, was a natural choice for Wertheimer, especially because the area around Nazareth caters to a large population of both Arabs and Jews, he says.

"My purpose is to keep people busy and out of mischief – to create good and interesting jobs for them that help families stay together. I want to get [the population around Nazareth] away from religion, and olive oil, and land and water – which have been the main issues – so they can be part of the free world," Wertheimer adds.

In a way, the latest park may be a replacement for the one Wertheimer was hoping to build for the Palestinians before the second intifadah broke out, shattering the deal. "I want the Arab and Jewish sectors both to be successful each in their own way," he says.

Wertheimer's original vision called for the building of a technology park in Gaza to grow trade and industry for the Palestinians. "I was just days away from getting all the OKs from everybody and then the intifadah made the whole thing impractical. I had signed letters and agreements in place."

But focusing inside Israel proper is important for peace in the region, too, Wertheimer believes. And it may even help to curb terrorism. He dares to hope that the new technology park may go some way toward bridging the divide.

"There is mistrust on both sides," he says, referring to allegations of land expropriation and water theft. He suggests that this lack of trust may be overcome not by coercion, but by allowing the two sides to be successful together.

Stef Wertheimer

Wertheimer thinks globally: "We must change the attitudes. Land and water are not the issues. We need to make this area a successful industrial area. The real problem will be how to get the word out in the market."

Don't ask him if he's a social revolutionary. Wertheimer balks at the description. What he's doing, he says, is just following a global trend. "The Irish made peace. Singapore is a successful place. South Korea is very successful after its independence. The Balkan area is relatively quiet now. All these places used tools that helped them to update modern industry."

These countries, he continues, became successful because of their willingness to be part of the global market. That's his vision for tech park number 6 in Nazareth.

"We copied everything from other countries," he says, referring to Tefen in the Galilee, where he notes that "we created 10,000 to 20,000 jobs for Arabs and Jews and Druze, which has made the Galilee a very positive place."

Eighty per cent of Wertheimer's family business, Iscar, was sold to American investor Warren Buffet in 2006 for $4 billion. But well before that, his reputation and panache for social entrepreneurial projects was already in gear.

The success of his technology park Tefen, built in 1982, is "a result of not being successful in the Knesset," Wertheimer says.

In the late 1970s and early '80s he tried and failed to convince the government that it should differentiate between paid jobs and skills in the Arab labour force: "I wanted to educate the people," he says, stressing that the Arab community has the same entitlement to entrepreneurship as its Jewish counterpart.

That failure pushed him to take matters into his own hands with Tefen, and he's been going full steam ahead ever since. While the new technology park's official status is that of a for-profit endeavour, Wertheimer says that despite its location on a site of just over three acres in area, it won't be a real estate investment. "We'll probably lose money," he says ruefully.

However, in this case, that's not the point. The park will include space for a combination of established and emerging industries and will also offer technical education in line with the European "Berufsschule" model – an economic model that encourages close relationships between the financial and industrial sectors to cultivate economic prosperity.

If his track record in the Galilee is anything to go by, Wertheimer will go some way toward transforming Nazareth into "a very positive place" as well.

Helping Israel staunch its brain drain

By GARY SUSSMAN
Special to The CJN

On a recent visit to Toronto, I met a dynamic young community leader and philanthropist. During an engaging conversation, he noted that his demographic was not connected to any of the Israeli universities, nor did he think that his peer group would – with the multitude of urgent causes out there – see higher education and Israeli universities as priorities. It's this crucial question that I seek to address.

Gary Sussman

It is worth remembering that three of the country's prestigious universities – the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology and the Weizmann Institute of Science – were created before the State of Israel. Building and supporting universities was an essential part of state-building. This visionary insight into the need to establish world-class universities before independence speaks volumes about the leaders of the Zionist movement and the notable Jewish families that supported these endeavours.

Some 60 years later, Israel is a vibrant democracy with a flourishing economy. The universities played a crucial role in that process. Their most important contribution was that they produced Israel's only and most crucial natural resource: Israel's human capital. Universities are, as New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman quipped, Israel's "oil fields." This early investment created the social and human capital that has since provided Israel with its qualitative edge.

The research at the leading research universities, for example, has laid the platform for Israel's dynamic high-tech economy. The innovation hub that has resulted is only second to Silicon Valley and has seen GDP per-capita income levels rise to standards of the leading OECD member countries. When we think of the contribution of higher education in these terms, the early investment by those philanthropists who supported the universities obtained an incredible return for the Jewish people.

Moreover, the research at the likes of Technion and Tel Aviv University also ensures that Israel maintains its qualitative security edge in a highly unstable neighbourhood. Much of this Israeli R&D (including research driven by security needs) has produced technologies that have improved the daily lives of millions, be it in medical devices, drugs, clean-tech or communications.

If we are to maintain this edge, we need to redouble our investment in education and our research universities. At a time when our neighbours and Iran are increasing their investment in higher education, the State of Israel has sadly cut its investment in higher education. This has led to a troubling brain drain, with talented young Israeli minds heading for America.

Israel is today the biggest net exporter of human capital in the realm of academia. For every four Israeli academics at an Israeli university, there is one at a major American university. In the field of computer science, the basis of our knowledge economy, the ratios area are higher: one-to-three. There is an implosion underway. Israeli universities have gone from being world leaders to stragglers. (It's worth mentioning that the second largest next exporter is Canada, which shares a border with the United States, followed by the Netherlands.)

These recurring budget cuts will see Israeli lose its edge and – in time – adversely affect innovation and our leadership in emerging areas such as clean-tech, bio-informatics and life sciences. I am not suggesting that philanthropy substitute for the state. This is neither feasible nor desirable. What Diaspora supporters and the growing number of Israelis funding universities can do is allow universities to maintain their qualitative edge, and in more extreme situations, stem the tide of talented academics going overseas for greater opportunity.

Our public universities fulfil one more important mission: they are able to facilitate greater inclusion and social mobility. The growing social gaps between the "haves" and those on the social and economic periphery of Israeli society pose a threat that can be addressed by access to higher education. My university pioneered a plan that allows students from the periphery to access education.

Israel has many needs and there are many opportunities for philanthropists. I believe that these points provide a compelling agenda for the next generation of philanthropists. Beyond the strategic need to maintain our qualitative edge and invest in our "oil fields," a philanthropic investment provides the fastest return for investors (philanthropists) when compared to investments in primary and secondary education and allows them to make a strategic investment.

My path to Israel advocacy

By ALAN HERMAN
Special to The CJN

While stories of my parents' kibbutz experiences were part of my childhood, it wasn't until The CJN covered the anti-Israel riot at Concordia University that I felt a desire to learn more about Israel. Now, after I've earned my master's in Middle Eastern studies at Ben-Gurion University in a MASA Israel Journey-accredited program, I have the tools and knowledge to build a career path based on my passion for Israel.

Following my first visit to Israel with Birthright Israel, after graduating from the University of Toronto, I returned to participate in a kibbutz ulpan program on Kibbutz Hazorea, the setting where my parents' lives first unfolded together.

While my family wasn't connected to the organized Jewish community in Canada, Israel was always part of our discussions. I was named for my parents' friend who was killed during the 1973 Yom Kippur War and have always felt a strong responsibility to leave my mark on the land. I learned Hebrew on the kibbutz and returned to Canada, sure that another extended stay was in my future.

Alan Herman

During 2004, there was a large spate of vandalism in Canada against Jewish sites – an arsonist attacked a Jewish day school and tombstones in a Jewish cemetery were destroyed. Increasingly, I found myself at pro-Israel rallies and knew that I needed to find a way to incorporate my passion for Israel into my daily life.

Ben-Gurion's master's in Middle Eastern studies (MAPMES) gave me the skills to pursue such a career path. In addition to brushing up on my Hebrew, I studied the Arab-Israeli conflict through primary documents under the guidance of Israeli scholar Benny Morris. I also helped organize excursions to the Office of the United Nations Special Co-ordinator for the Middle East Peace Process and the Israel-Palestine Center for Research and Information; I assisted Jamal Alkirnawi, the Bedouin counsellor of Arab students at Ben-Gurion University in his research on Jewish-Arab reconciliation through storytelling, and I engaged in studies of particular personal interest, such as the role of Canada in the Middle East peace process.

The most striking part of my experience was the reactions I received from Israelis, who found my concern for Israel both surprising and inspiring. As they were made aware of the amount of energy I hope to invest one day in Israel advocacy, they were reminded of the importance of the Jewish state.

Ironically, they were the ones who served in the army and have made their lives in Israel, yet it took a Canadian who experienced anti-Israel and anti-Semitic sentiment in Canada to provide a different perspective on the significance of their service.

I returned to Canada with my master's degree in hand, and became a research associate at the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research. After two successful years with the institute, I now work with the Quebec-Israel Committee for its Quebec parliamentary program.

MASA's Ben-Gurion University MAPMES program provided me with the tools to launch a meaningful career. I hope other young adults will take advantage of such opportunities in Israel.

Alan Herman lives in Montreal.

Homa Sarshar: A towering figure in Persian Jewry

By CYRUS NEEKPOUR
Special to The CJN

When it comes to contemporary Iranian Jewry and its impact on Iranian society, Homa Sarshar is certain to be among the first names to surface. A closer look into Sarshar's life and her contribution to the preservation of Persian Jewish heritage makes it clear that she is a towering figure.

Sarshar is a Los Angeles-based veteran journalist, producer, documentary maker, researcher and political commentator. A highly respected public figure in the Persian community, Sarshar's name appears in numerous print and electronic journals and documentaries.

The CJN spoke with Sarshar in her home office in Los Angeles, Calif., to discuss her experience as a Persian Jewish journalist and her work on the preservation of Persian Jewish heritage.

Born in Shiraz, the city of great Persian poets, and raised in Tehran, Sarshar earned her BA in French literature from Tehran University. As a rising star in Iranian journalism in the 1970s, Sarshar worked for a publication covering women's issues and later made a big move to the Kayhan daily, one of Iran's most prominent news publications, which today is under the control of right-wing revolutionaries.

Sarshar's immigration to the United States in December 1978 was one of the most reluctant moves of her life. It took place during the heady days of the revolution when she lost her job at Kayhan at a time when prejudice against Jews in Iran was growing with the rise in religious zealotry of revolutionaries.

Sarshar said that after she moved to the United States, the reality of not going back to Iran set in, a realization that took its toll on her in the form of a severe depression. She found a way to lift herself out of this emotional predicament by enrolling in graduate school. The decision took her to the master's program at Annenberg School of Communication at the University of Southern California. She later received an honorary PhD in journalism from American World University.

Homa Sarshar

Sarshar's most significant work in exile has been her tireless research, and her collection of literature on the Jewish Persian heritage. Her interest in the topic was at first personal, but she found a serious lack of information, even though Jews have lived in Iran for more than 25 centuries. Her disappointment at the lack of literature on the subject, and her continued enthusiasm for it culminated in her1995 founding of the Center for Iranian Jewish Oral History (CIJOH: www.cijoh.org) in Los Angeles.

The establishment of the centre was at an opportune time, Sarshar said, because of the mass migration of Iranians, including those of Jewish background, to the Southern California region.

This provided a rich pool of resources from which to glean information. Many of the Jewish émigrés, Sarshar said, were in their 50s, 60s and 70s, and they agreed to have their experiences and knowledge documented for her research. As part of this research, she interviewed more than 100 Iranian Jews, documenting their accounts of life in Iran, their sociocultural and economic experiences and their ancestral background. The work also included over 30 video documentaries, interviews and a large collection of photos. Today, the information and literature coming out of CIJOH is regarded as an important source for researchers, not just in the United States, but also in Europe and Israel.

Sarshar has received numerous awards for her work, including the Medal for Special Achievement in Women's Rights, given by The Iranian Women's Organization of Tehran; the Journalism Award: Distinguished Iranian Women by The Encyclopaedia Iranica; and a commendation for community affairs services by the County of Los Angeles.

Helping Beit Halochem

'No future for this regime'

Because the goal of CIJOH was to make its literature available to the public for research and education, it decided to distribute its works in digitized format to three institutions: the Library of Congress; the Department of Oral History at the University of California at Los Angeles (UCLA); and the Center for Iranian Studies at Tel Aviv University.

Sarshar is quick to express her gratitude and appreciation for her son Houman Sarshar, who holds a PhD in comparative literature from Columbia University and has assisted her in her research on Persian Jewry. One of CIJOH's most significant works is the publication of the highly acclaimed book Esther's Children: A Portrait of Iranian Jews. The book is a compilation of 25 articles on Iranian Jewry edited by Houman Sarshar. Sarshar's other son Sepehr is a doctor conducting research on cancer.

Before turning our discussion to recent events in Iran, Sarshar talked about her attachment to Israel, where she has aunts, nieces and nephews. She travels to Israel to visit her relatives and give speeches at academic institutions.

We saw Sarshar's passionate side when we started to talk about post-election events in Iran and the Iranians' quest to build a democratic society free of religious ideology.

"First and foremost, there is no future for this regime," she said. But she added that despite the difficult road ahead, a big change for Iran is on the horizon.

She was quick to characterize the movement as being genuinely grassroots, born out of people's frustration with the Islamic regime and its repressive policies over the past 30 years. She believes that sooner or later, Iranians will have the democracy they truly deserve. On the regime's crackdown of protesters, including their sexual violation at the hands of regime agents, Sarshar believes that these tactics have been perpetrated by the Islamic regime in Tehran since the early 1980s, and despite all recent post-election publicity, they continue to be perpetrated.

Sarshar describes Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and his inner circle as long-standing members of Hojattiyeh, a cult-like group with deeply religious fundamentalist orientations. They are virulently anti-western and anti-Israel in particular and, to a lesser degree, against Sunni Muslims.

"Their cult-like beliefs compel them to terrorize others to achieve their goals."

The incorporation of ideology into a system of religious beliefs is a deadly combination, Sarshar said. It has been witnessed in various cultures and countries, and it is not limited only to Islam.

As to what Barack Obama's administration's policy on Iran is and should be, Sarshar argues that Obama is in a difficult and awkward situation. "I believe negotiations with Iran will continue without getting anywhere because the regime does not respect its own promises."

The Obama administration, according to Sarshar, might get somewhere by having more meetings with Iranian officials, but such meetings will not produce any concrete results. However, she believes that Obama deserves the benefit of the doubt.

Sarshar is presently putting the finishing touches on her upcoming book, which is a compilation of interviews with prominent figures over the years.

Researcher describes little-known world of Jewish pirates

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Avast Yossi, there be Jewish pirates present. Not mangy men of violence who'd think nothing of boarding yer ship, keelhauling ya, stealing yer cargo and then putting in to the safety of the privateer haven at Tortuga.

Arrgg, these be kosher-eating, Shabbat-keeping pirates who sailed the Seven Seas and plundered gold- and silver-loaded galleons plying the Spanish Main.

Arrgg. Do you want to hear more?

Well, Long John Silver aside, you don't have to dive to the depths of Davy Jones' locker to unlock the secret history of Jewish pirates. Researcher Diana Mingail has done it for you, combing libraries of source material to present a fascinating take on a little-known aspects of the pirate world spanning the 15th to 18th centuries. Mingail, who has presented her findings to community groups, enlightened a small group attending a recent afternoon event at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

Surprisingly, Jews were no strangers to the world of piracy and privateering (not the same thing), with the most famous of the buccaneers hailing from Sephardi families dispossessed by the Spanish government. In seeking revenge for the Spanish Inquisition and the expulsion of 1492, several prominent Jews took to piracy. Perhaps the most famous, Jean Lafitte, saw action centuries later, but he, too, was the descendant of Sephardi Jews who had fled Spain for France.

Batholomew Diaz

Lafitte not only harassed the Spanish in the Americas but he also became a real American hero, providing manpower, gunpowder and intelligence that helped the United States defeat a British incursion at New Orleans at the tail end of the War of 1812.

As a result of his heroics, Lafitte and his men were granted a full pardon for smuggling as well as citizenship rights.

So how do nice Jewish boys become pirates or privateers?

In Mingail's telling, most were seeking revenge against Spain. In Lafitte's case, Spanish Inquisitors put to death his maternal grandfather, a Converso – a Jew who had been forced to convert to Christianity but who secretly practised Judaism.

"Jean Lafitte came to hate Spain and the Spanish people," Mingail said.

His family fled to France and later to the West Indies (the Caribbean). From there, the family moved to New Orleans. In 1808, he and his brother, Pierre, established "a pirate kingdom in Barataria Bay, which was on the Gulf of Mexico, 100 miles south of New Orleans," Mingail said.

"Lafitte and his pirates operated under letters of marque from Colombia, which was fighting for independence from Spain. The letters of marque were a legal document indicating Lafitte was operating as a privateer under the authority of the Colombian government against the country's enemy – Spain."

Hugely successful, the Lafittes captured numerous Spanish vessels and seized their cargoes.

By 1811, Barataria hosted 32 armed warships, more than the U.S. navy, and was a commercial hub serving New Orleans.

Lafitte imposed a sort of pirate's code, enacting rules against murder and sexual predation and banning attacks on American ships. Pirates' widows and orphans were cared for and the booty was shared equally.

Lafitte settled in St. Louis

Lafitte's anti-Spanish efforts continued until 1821 when the United States and Spain made peace. He eventually moved to St. Louis, where he became a labour leader

Other prominent pirates included "Sinan the Jew." Sinan served the sultan of Turkey, where refuge had been granted to Spanish Jews expelled from Spain. In 1538, Sinan commanded a Turkish armada and destroyed much of the Spanish fleet near Greece.

Samuel Pallache, known as "the Pirate Rabbi," was the son of a rabbi from Cordoba, Spain. Born in Morocco, Pallache not only helped negotiate a treaty with Holland, he was also authorized by the Dutch government as a privateer, giving him the legal right to attack ships belonging to Holland's enemy, Spain.

Moses Cohen Henriques co-operated with the Dutch West India Company to capture Spanish treasure ships, seizing gold, silver and merchandise worth the equivalent of $1 billion US in today's currency.

With the aid of the Dutch, he captured Recife in present-day Brazil, and he set up a pirate island nearby "where Jews could practise their religion openly," Mingail said. When Brazil was recaptured by Spain in 1654, Henriques became an adviser to famed pirate Henry Morgan.

Other pirates cited by Mingail included Bartholomew Diaz, whose actual name had been Balthasar. One of the "Portugals" – Jewish refugees from Portugal who lived in Jamaica beginning in 1511 – Diaz attacked Spanish ships as a pirate. After being captured by the Spanish and scheduled to be hanged, he swam to safety and hid for three days in a swamp. After being rescued by Jamaican pirates, he continued harassing the Spanish fleet and "remained a pirate to the end of his days," she said.

> 'Their galleys were kosher and they kept the Sabbath'

Jamaica, meanwhile, prospered as a home base for pirates attacking Spanish merchantmen. The island's Jews "shared in the booty. They financed captain Henry Morgan's raids on Spanish ports, including his famous conquest of the city of Panama. That was another blow against Spain, and the 'Portugals' of Jamaica helped to make it happen."

Yaakov Morel commanded three ships, while David Abrabanel, who hailed from a famous Sephardi rabbinic family, went by the name Captain Davis and commanded a ship called The Jerusalem, Mingail said.

Some Jewish pirates operated off the coast of Chile and "their galleys were kosher and they kept the Sabbath," she added.

"It is clear that Jews revenged themselves on their enemy, Spain, wherever they could and in every way they could," she said.

The Goldbergs dramatized the lives of a Jewish family

By ROSALIN KRIEGER
Special to The CJN

I heard of a household in a nearby city where no telephone calls are answered between 7:45 and 8:00 p.m. because The Goldbergs are on the air.
(A fan letter, Maine, 1932).

In a time of entertainment and electronic overload, it is perhaps hard to picture a period in which families enthusiastically gathered around radios in North America over 80 years ago.

It is perhaps even harder to imagine listeners, both Jewish and gentile, working and middle class, "visiting" with a Jewish family on a regular basis, some not taking phone calls while it aired, as the quote above alludes to. Nov. 20, 2009, marks the 80th anniversary of the debut of the landmark radio program The Goldbergs (1929-1946), which dramatized the daily lives of a fictional Jewish family – immigrant parents, Molly and Jake, and their two U.S. born children, Sammy and Rosie, and their uncle David – from the Bronx and later Lastonbury, a fictional town in Connecticut.

I can safely – and sadly – assume I am one of a handful of people in Canada who knows about the show and the driven woman behind it. Gertrude Berg (formerly Edelstein,1899-1966), the show's creator and star, was a woman ahead of her time in a male-dominated and rapidly expanding industry looking for ethnic/dialect radio entertainment because of the mega success of Amos 'n' Andy (1928-1965). In 1929, Berg, a frustrated yet ambitious homemaker and bookkeeper in her father's Catskill resort, became the auteur, actor, writer and producer of The Goldbergs.

Her first paycheck from NBC netted her $75 a week from which she had to pay her cast, however, by the mid-1930s, Berg, with an estimated annual salary of $1 million, became the highest paid woman in U.S. radio. She adapted the popular show for vaudeville, a comic strip, the Broadway stage, a Hollywood film and television. Long before many of the pop stars of today, she developed a successful clothing line (for plus-sized women), and wrote a cookbook (even though she never cooked in real life), an advice column (Mama Talks) and book on family issues. Berg was a one-woman financial empire. Yet, to legions of fans, Molly was the perfect mother who hovered over her family, community and a nation in need of guidance, comfort and escape.

Meet the Goldbergs

Berg, whose own mother, Dinah, was institutionalized periodically after the death of her son, created an idealized and sympathetic mother in Molly (Shakespeare) Goldberg. She was an optimistic, unglamorous, soft-spoken family matriarch and guide in all matters, domestic, moral and romantic who spoke with Yiddish cadence and malapropism ("Don't be an 'ear dropper,' she told Rosie) and coined phrases such as, "Spill me some coffee," and, "I'll scramble you" (some eggs). She was the busybody moral compass and dispenser of homespun advice such as, "Indifference is de greatest sin in the world." (1941). Molly's door and kitchen, much to husband Jake's chagrin ("An army I'm feeding!"), was always open to friends, neighbours and strangers. Jake, a tailor and later a factory owner, who was abrasive, yet kind and smart, also learned from Molly, as the program announcer once said in 1941, Jake must learn from Molly to "accept people in terms of what they can become and not in terms of what they've done."

Assuaging anxiety and alienation

The Goldbergs also tapped into the buried cultural longings of its assimilated Jewish listeners and the need for guidance and comfort in its Christian listeners. She, Peter Smith writes, sensed "what the audience wanted and in some instances needed," especially during the Depression. Psychologist Dorothy Berg (Berg's daughter-in-law) told Smith in 1998, "Berg never really recovered from Dinah's breakdown and... death. Instead The Goldbergs provided a possible means of escapism, and... Molly Goldberg [was] the perfect Jewish mother in a world untouched by tragedy or death. Molly represented something... she wouldn't talk about... perhaps her mother."

Religious ritual and utopia

Unlike the realistic and painful depictions of generational conflict and ambivalence of Jewish immigrant life on the Lower East Side in the early 20th century, by Jewish writers such as Anzia Yezierska (1881-1970), who, unlike Berg, actually grew up on the Lower East Side, Berg's Jewish-American vision was decidedly escapist, and hence, more profitable.

In order to attract a wide and diverse audience, she created a program that did not offend the sensibilities of the majority of her non-Jewish and Jewish listeners. In this sense, The Goldbergs was very much like the utopia of The Cosby Show (1984-1992), a world devoid of racial, religious, gender and class strife.

Show promoted inter-group unity

Berg made this point very clear in a 1956 interview with Commentary: "I don't bring up anything that will bother people... unions, politics, fundraising, Zionism, socialism, inter-group relations... I keep things average. I don't want to lose friends."

This formula was popular among non-Jews, as this letter attests to: "The Goldbergs"... present life as it should be... we like the democratic and friendly feeling they have for Jew, gentile and Catholic... 'Molly' is a beautiful character, an example for all wives and mothers and her philosophy is practical for our everyday living. We like their patriotism, their constructive charitable acts, their sympathy for friends in pleasure or trouble... we cannot imagine any portrayal of family more perfect" (excerpt from a fan letter from Oklahoma City, January 1933, Gertrude Berg Archives).

Except for an oblique reference to Kristallnacht shortly after it occurred (a stone was thrown through the Goldberg's window in a Passover episode of 1939) and the Goldberg parents being called "red outsiders" in a 1937 episode, the family was virtually unscathed with Molly handing out advice and helping others. Like the black characters of Amos 'n' Andy (1928-1965) who never faced any racism and were never called a racial slur, this Jewish family inhabited a protective vacuum free of anti-Jewishness of any kind.

Much of the show's content promoted inter-group unity, namely between Jews and Christians, especially in the High Holiday episodes. In all the Jewish religious related programming that I have listened to, and the scripts that I have read, Berg made a point of promoting harmony in various ways, especially at holiday time. In one notable 1944 Yom Kippur episode, Molly and Rosie walk down a street in Cleveland in search of a synagogue and just happen to bump into a real Christian clergyman, Rev. Schuyler, who is on his way to share the pulpit with a Rabbi Newman, something he says they do every year. "In our town," he explains, "Jew and non-Jew have lived side by side so amicably for so many generations that it's no longer unusual for us to take part in each other's religious services."

Gertrude Berg as Molly Goldberg

Religion in the show

The Goldbergs was most directly and lovingly Jewish at holiday time as Berg took great pains to research Jewish ritual and liturgy. Although she did not receive "religious training," as a child, as she put it in 1935, the Goldbergs celebrated Sammy's bar mitzvah, Passover seders and Yom Kippur with performers such as Jan Peerce singing Kol Nidrei. These episodes rekindled long-forgotten vestiges of Jewish holiday celebrations in many Jewish listeners of different ages. In addition to religious instruction and celebration, these episodes were interwoven with U.S. values of freedom and individualism, because so much of Berg's unspoken project was to make Jews more acceptable to non-Jews and for this, many Jewish viewers were appreciative.

Jewish journalist Hilda Kassell, in 1932, credited Berg for being "greatly responsible for conveying a more sympathetic understanding of Jews and Jewish life to misinformed gentile listeners than anyone I could think of." After the Yom Kippur episode of 1943, a Jewish educator from Cleveland wrote Berg that the series "has done more to set us Jews right with the 'goyim' than all the sermons ever preached by the rabbis."

Berg's legacy

According to Berg's 1934 NBC radio biography, seven words: "It's a Story of a Jewish Family" for a long time stood between her and an audition." What chance did a show about a Jewish family, in a period of virulent anti-Jewishness, at the onset of the Great Depression have in a national medium? A slim one, but Berg was able to convince the powers-that-be that a Jewish show was viable. She drew upon and rejected aspects of Amos 'n' Andy's performance of a marginalized ethnic community. She was fortunate that as a Jewish person she was able to depict Jews as she wanted to, unlike black Americans in the same era who were routinely denied access to programming that was not music related. Eighty years ago, with the radio debut of The Goldbergs on U.S. radio, Berg carved a niche in radio history and her country's conscience, psyche and heart.

Rosalin Krieger is a doctoral candidate in Toronto currently writing her dissertation on tropes of Jewishness in Seinfeld. She has also written extensively about such television series as Arrested Development, Curb Your Enthusiasm, Everybody Loves Raymond, The Larry Sanders Show and Sex in the City.

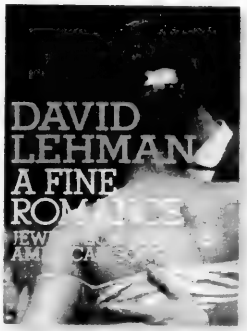
What makes a song Jewish?

By MICHAEL HANDELZALTS

David Lehman, the author of A Fine Romance: Jewish Songwriters, American Songs (Nextbook Press), is passionate about what is commonly called the "Great American Songbook."

The term refers to all those popular songs from the 1920s up through the 1960s, many of them written originally for the stage, that people in America and around the world continue to hum – the "standards." Both the melodies and the lyrics comprise the soundtrack of the lives of millions, including Lehman, who integrates snatches of quotes from many into the text of his book, which only makes the reading that much more enjoyable.

Lehman, who is also a poet and editor, is Jewish, as were so many of the composers and lyricists who contributed to the American Songbook over the years, writing mainly for Broadway and Hollywood: George M. Cohan, Jerome Kern, Irving Berlin, George and Ira Gershwin, Frank Loesser, Richard Rodgers, Lorenz Hart, Oscar Hammerstein II, Harold Arlen, Leonard Bernstein, Stephen Sondheim and many others.



There was only one non-Jewish songwriter of the calibre of those mentioned above, namely Cole Porter. And he is the one credited with the saying that constitutes the backbone of this book, and the reason it is part of the Schocken/ Nextbook Jewish Encounters series. In 1926, Rodgers, at the time already an established name on Broadway (for his work with lyricist Lorenz Hart) met Porter, then an ambitious but still struggling composer and lyricist for the theatre. Rodgers recognized a fellow talent, and Porter confided that after all his failures on Broadway, he felt he had finally figured out the secret of writing hits: "I'll write Jewish tunes," he said.

Lehman tries to decipher and explain just what a "Jewish tune" is, which is to say, to understand in what way the Jewishness of these songwriters contributed to their success. Some of the answers offered may sound obvious – a few were sons of cantors (Berlin, Arlen) – but others seem a little far-fetched.

There may, for example, be some resemblance between the melody of the first line of George Gershwin's Swanee, "I've been away from you a long time" (words by Irving Caesar), with the Sabbath prayer Hashivenu. One may hear melodic overtones from the blessing over the Torah – "Borchu et HaShem Hamevorackh" – with the Gershwin brothers' It Ain't Necessarily So (whose subject is biblical anyway). As with etymologies of similar-sounding words from different languages, though, one needs to be careful in identifying snatches of melodies here and there. Resemblances don't necessarily mean a thing, even if they've got that swing.

There is no doubt, however, that one can point to some common and pretty general qualities that many of the popular songs written by the composers mentioned above share: the minor key, bent notes, altered chords and a melancholy edge. Most of them are also witty, clever, skilfully rhymed, and full of humour, self-irony and unabashed sentimentality – qualities that could arguably also be labelled as Jewish.

You can find many Yiddishisms in the lyrics ("Alright, I'm just a no-goodnik /Alright already, it's true /So nu /So, sue me, sue me"' – Sue Me from Guys and Dolls), or "Yiddish syntax," which often means "bending" the sentence structure to fit the melody, which was often written first (which is why Ira Gershwin claimed that any resemblance between lyrics and poetry is purely coincidental, though I dare to think he was being overly modest). But, as we all know now, the non-Jew Cole Porter could also write a song about Hothouse Rose, whose name is Rosenbaum, and who when she buys some perfume, "now ... smells like a rose 'n' bloom." So again, incorporation of a "Jewish" element does not necessarily make it a Jewish song.

Jewish words and expressions made it into English long before Jewish songwriters got on the bandwagon: "chutzpah," for instance, is dated by Merriam-Webster back to 1883. I'm not sure that word was ever used in one of those popular songs, but who knows.

Best song ever

Did the Jewish songwriters have chutzpah? Some did, and some didn't. Irving Berlin told his right-hand man Helmy Kresa (who transcribed and orchestrated his songs for him, as Berlin never learned to read or write music, and played the piano only in the key of F) sometime in mid-1942: "I want you to take down a song I wrote over the weekend. Not only is it the best song I ever wrote, it's the best song anybody ever wrote." The song was White Christmas. (Such a claim, made before the composition was even on sheet music, took some chutzpah, even if White Christmas did turn out to be a huge hit.)

On the other hand, Lorenz Hart was plagued with insecurities. Despite the many hits he had to his name, he did not see himself fit to co-operate with his longtime partner Richard Rodgers on Oklahoma!, a decision that was instrumental in creating another successful duo, of Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein II (who until then had collaborated a lot with Jerome Kern).

With all their ego, most of those songwriters were still able to be generous with one another: Berlin looked up to Kern, Gershwin wanted to be Berlin's secretary, Rodgers helped Porter and produced the music of others in addition to writing his own. They may have been competitors in a field where popularity and sales are the name of the game, but they were also always ready to admit a new talent into their fold and recognize his – or her, let's not forget Dorothy Fields, one of the very few females in the book – talent. Lehman points out that some of the great successes of the American musical occurred when the Jewish musical-lyrical idiom met the African-American: The Gershwins' Porgy and Bess (1935), Kern and Hammerstein's Show Boat (in 1927, with Ol' Man River), and perhaps most significantly, The Jazz Singer (1927). The latter was the first motion picture with sound, the real-life story of a cantor's son (Al Jolson) who leaves his Orthodox Jewish family to sing jazz, decked out minstrel-style in blackface, and still makes it in time from shul, where he chants the Kol Nidrei prayer, in place of his dying father, uptown to the musical stage, where he wows them all, his mother included, with April Follies.

Many wonderful gems in Lehman's book

Lehman paints a vivid picture of the times, starting with World War II (Kern wrote, "And when I told them how beautiful you are, they didn't believe me," and Porter, who was entertaining the troops in Europe with a portable piano on his back changed the lyrics to, "And when I told them how dangerous it was, they didn't believe me" –They Didn't Believe Me); the carefree times before the crash; the Depression years (Brother, Can You Spare a Dime, lyrics by Yip Harburg); and then the years leading to World War II and after. He juxtaposes some dates: Berlin's God Bless America was first performed on the radio, by Kate Smith, a day after Kristallnacht, in 1938; crematorium II in Auschwitz began to operate on March 31, 1943, the same day Oklahoma! opened on Broadway. He sees the Jewish songwriters as expressing with their art the spirit of America.

Not overtly Jewish

But with all the anecdotes and quotes he provides – some of them presented as fictional meetings with Uncle Jerry (Kern) or Uncle Harold (Arlen), or equally fictional interviews with Ira Gershwin or Sammy Cahn – the thesis about the meaning of Jewishness in the American Songbook falls short, due to the very simple fact that most of those songwriters didn't live an overtly Jewish life, nor did they make too much of their own Jewishness, even privately. Rodgers wrote about himself that he identified as a Jew "for socio-ethnic reasons rather than because of any deep religious conviction." None of them was a regular guest in synagogue on Friday night. All of them were hardworking artists and artisans providing material for another opening, another show.

The popular songs written by all the Jewish artists I've mentioned shared many qualities with other popular songs of that era. If they were – and are – unique, it is due less to any particular Jewishness than it is to the individual talents of the composers and lyricists. The question, "What does it mean to be Jewish in America?" is very much in fashion these days, but the biographies and works of all those songwriters does not help to clarify the issue. Still, raising the issue, even if it is impossible to answer it in a satisfying way, presents a great opportunity to wallow in the stories of their life – quoting lyrics, retelling entertainment lore, remembering songs and having as much fun as possible, which Lehman clearly has, even writing a few pastiches as tributes to particular composers or lyricists, one of them wholly made up of phrases from well-known lyrics.

Part of the charm of this book is that under the pretext of exploring the Jewishness of the American Songbook, one comes across some wonderful gems. One is Lehman's explanation of how it is that we usually know, and sing, only the refrain of the song, as popularized by recording artists, omitting the verse which leads to it, which was usually performed when the song was part of a show.

The Gershwin brothers' The Man I Love, for instance, starts with a long preamble, actually a kind of recitative that is a beautiful piece of music (and lyrics) in itself: "When the mellow moon begins to beam/ Ev'ry night I dream a little dream/ And of course Prince Charming is the theme: the 'he' for me./ Although I realize as well as you/ It is seldom that a dream comes true/ To me it's clear/ That he'll appear." Only then comes, "Someday he'll come along/ The man I love."

Sammy Cahn explains that the "verse is just the preface to the chorus. For every verse there ever was, you can substitute one phrase: 'And that's why I say.'" By the way, The Man I Love was written to be part of one musical, but was scrapped during tryouts; then another musical was written especially to include it (the producer liked the tune), was dropped during tryouts, was published (not recorded –that's how songs were sold then, as sheets) only when the Gershwin brothers agreed to cut their royalties, and then was dropped from yet another musical, until it finally made it on its own.

There is little that Lehman does not know about his subject, so one can wonder if it's really right to ask for anything more. Still, I would like to point out two names I missed from the story. One is Kurt Weill, who, though he emigrated from Germany only at age 35, contributed gems like September Song and Saga of Jenny to the American Songbook. The other is Stephen Sondheim. Both are mentioned in the timeline the author provides at the end of the book: Weill for the opening of Threepenny Opera in 1928, in Berlin; and Sondheim, with his date of birth in 1930, and his lyrics for West Side Story in 1957.

But there is no further word about Sondheim's significant and innovative contribution to American popular music, which continues to this day, though I agree that it is difficult to pinpoint its Jewishness. And incidentally, Lehman notes that the line, "Who could ask for anything more" is a key line in two Gershwin songs: Nice Work If You Can Get It? and I Got Rhythm. It is also a key line in Sondheim's More, as performed by Madonna in the movie Dick Tracy (1990). And the whole song is a tribute to the American popular song culture: "Once upon a time I had plenty of nothing/ Which was fine with me/ Because I had rhythm, music, love/ The sun, the stars and the moon above/ Had the clear blue sky and the deep blue sea/ That was when the best things in life were free./ Then time went by and now I got plenty of plenty/ Which is fine with me/ 'Cause I still got love, I still got rhythm/ But look at what I got to go with 'em/ "Who could ask for anything more?"/ I hear you query/ Who could ask for anything more?/ Well, let me tell you, dearie."

The tale of two floods

By AVNER MEIRI
Special to The CJN

I read with admiration Alex Gropper's articles on the Babylonians and the Bible in The CJN in January of this year. The articles were condensed with a great deal of information about the influence of the Babylonian culture on the Jewish people and the writing of the Hebrew Bible.

Gropper mentioned The Epic of Gilgamesh, a story of a flood that is similar to the one in the Bible. This story is at least 1,500 to 2,000 years older than the story of Noah in Genesis.

I would like here to add more details about The Epic of Gilgamesh, which was written in cuneiform script on clay tablets and discovered in the 1850s at the ruins of one of the two libraries built by Ashurbanipal, king of Assyria (669- 627 BCE), in Nineveh, the capital of Assyria.

In 1946, I had the opportunity to visit the ruins of Nineveh, which are located a short distance from Mosul in northern Iraq. Nineveh was destroyed in the year 612 BCE and the library lay underground for more than 1,900 years until it was discovered and brought to the British Museum. Years later, George Smith, an assistant to the museum, found two wonderful stories: a Babylonian story of creation and a Babylonian flood story.

The flood story, known as The Epic of Gilgamesh, was originally titled He Who Saw the Deep or Surpassing All Other Kings. Gilgamesh might have been a real ruler in the 27th century BCE.

The essential story revolves around the relationship between Gilgamesh, who became distracted and disheartened during his rule, and a friend, Enkidu, who was half-wild and undertook dangerous quests with Gilgamesh.

Following Enkidu's death, Gilgamesh starts to search for immortality. Eventually, he meets Utnapishtim, the hero of the flood myth. Utnapishtim tells Gilgamesh about the god Ea, who advised him to build an ark to protect himself and his family. The god later created a catastrophic flood, which Utnapishtim \ survived.

Utnapishtim's story is similar to that of Noah and the flood in the book of Genesis. Let us look at what Utnapishtim says of his experience and what the Bible tells us of Noah and the flood.

Utnapishtim
• On the fifth day, I decided upon the ark's plan. The floor was 200 feet square. The walls were 200 feet high.
Genesis
• The length of the ark shall be 300 cubits (1 cubit equals 1.5 feet), the breadth of it 50 cubits and the height of it 30 cubits. (Genesis 6:13).
Utnapishtim
• I gave it six stories and divided the breadth seven times.
Genesis
With lower, second, and third stories shalt thou make it (6:16)... Rooms shalt thou make in the ark (6:14). And shalt pitch it within and without with pitch (6:14). And Noah and his sons, and his wife, and his sons' wives, went into the ark because of the waters of the flood.
Utnapishtim
• Six sar (measures) of bitumen I poured into the kiln. All that I had I loaded, of the seed of all living things. I brought into the ship my whole family and kinsfolk. The cattle of the field, the beasts of the field, all craftsmen – I made them go up into it.
Genesis
• Of clean beasts, and of beasts that are not clean, and of fowls, and of everything that creepeth upon the earth. There went in two and two unto Noah into the ark, the male and the female, as God had commanded Noah (7:7-9). And the Lord shut him in (7:16).
Utnapishtim
• I went into the ship and closed my door. As soon as a gleam of dawn shone in the sky, came a black cloud from the foundation of heaven. Inside it, Adad (a Sumerian god) thundered. Adad's rage reached to the heavens, turning all light to darkness.
Genesis
• And it came to pass, after seven days, that the waters of the flood were upon the earth... the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened (7:10-11).
Utnapishtim
• Six days and nights raged the wind. The flood, the cyclone devastated the land.
Genesis
• And the flood was 40 days upon the earth and the waters increased. And the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth, and all the high hills that were under the whole heaven (Chapter 7).
Utnapishtim
• The sea became calm, the cyclone died away, the flood ceased.
Genesis
• The fountains of the deep and the windows of heaven were stopped; and the rain from heaven was restrained. And the waters returned from off the earth continually, and after the end of the 150 days, the waters were abated (8:2,3).
Utnapishtim
• And all mankind had turned to clay. The ground was flat like a roof. I opened the window and the light fell on my face.
Genesis
• And all flesh died that moved upon the earth... and every man (7:21). And it came to pass at the end of 40 days, that Noah opened the window of the ark which he had made (8:6).
Utnapishtim
• The ship lay upon Mount Nisir. Mount Nisir held the ship and allowed it not to move.
Genesis
• And the ark rested in the seventh month, on the 17th day of the month, upon the mountains of Ararat (8:4).

Avner Meiri, a scholar and teacher, passed away in Toronto on Nov. 30, 2009.

Happy Chanukah

Where birds sing

By Rose Romberg

It is written
You took us out of bondage, gave us manna and parted the Red Sea yet You rebuked Your angels because they sang while
Egyptians drowned.
You cried: "Why do you sing?
They, too, are My children."

Sovereign of all that exists forgive my presumption for my mind is veiled.
You did decree:
"Thou shalt have no other gods."

For moments in time
we flourished and once again
man became complacent, self-worshipping... still, You showed mercy.

Your chosen people survived the Inquisition, Stalin and Hitler.

Moans from innocent souls echoed in heaven's chambers, human ashes turned grass grey
I wept in silence.

Surely Your intervention softened the gentile heart and behold...
The State of Israel reborn!

Pioneers turned swamp and sand into orange groves, carob trees fields of corn and young forests
where birds sing.
"If you will it, it is no dream."

With heads bowed, we embraced the Western Wall in silent prayer of thanksgiving.
Hands joined, rhythmic feet danced
the Horah, voices soared in song.
Hatikvah!

Such rejoicing, such profound sense of freedom I had never known and I, I have dignity!
I belong!
Still blood flows.

Today I feel Your anger.
It grieves me.
But not all of Your children have fallen from grace.
I know You to be a merciful God.
"Give Me ten righteous men, "You said.
Are not our houses of worship brimming with righteous men to temper your displeasure?

God and God of my Fathers once again I ask Your pardon for my doubt-divided mind.
But I am frightened for my people.
Your creatures, Your Yerusholayim.

Every corner of our sphere
echoes of lust, greed and persecution.
Once again Hitler's graven image
looms... swastikas flutter in the winds.
Will the predators never be stilled?

I have seen Your wrath.
With one thrust the lights went out.
Has the time come for another Ark...?

During one starry night

By Moshe Gruda

During one summer night
While the stars were shining bright
I marvelled at the comeliness of the sky;
At myriads of bright sparks from those stars swimming around
In an ethereal sea; yet never getting drowned

All of a sudden... from somewhere
A star broke off and hurriedly, across the sky
In far distance flight, began to veer
And vanished into a half circle...

Oh, wasn't it too early for this star to disappear?

With my eyes I clasped that star
And cruised along ever so far
I muse... was all this just a ruse?
A ruse that could prevent
The culmination of our longed for goal...
Our main event

NO! This is still part of the process of creation
And we remain indebted as a nation
For the wondrous gift of free will
That leads us to the realization
That everything is Godly
And God is Perfection...
The One and Only

Did UK issue warrant for Tzipi Livni?

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Tzipi Livni, leader of Israel's Kadima party, cancelled her appearance at a Jewish function in London because a warrant for her arrest had been issued over her part in the Gaza offensive, Arab-language media reported.

Al-Quds Al-Arabi claimed that Scotland Yard advised the organizers of the Jewish National Fund conference in northwest London that the former foreign minister had cancelled her scheduled address on Monday over threats of a possible charges being pressed by pro-Palestinian groups.

The Al-Quds Al-Arabi report also said that a group of about 100 anti-Israel protesters rallied outside the Hendon Hall Hotel on Sunday, just as delegates arrived at the JNF event.

Tzipi Livni

Livni's office said in a statement following the report that her appearance at the London event was cancelled two weeks ago due to a scheduling conflict.

Livni's office also said that the opposition leader was proud of all the decisions she made as foreign minister during last winter's Gaza war, an operation that she said achieved its goal of bringing security to Israel.

A United Kingdom court two months ago deferred until further notice an appeal by local pro-Palestinian groups to issue an arrest warrant against visiting Defence Minister Ehud Barak.

Bnei Menashe celebrate Chanukah

The remaining 7,200 members of the Bnei Menashe community of northeastern India ushered in the festival of Chanukah last weekend, as they continue to hope to make aliyah. The Bnei Menashe were not aware of Chanukah's existence until the modern era, because their ancestors were exiled from the Land of Israel some 560 years before the historical events the holiday commemorates. The Bnei Menashe (Hebrew for "sons of Manasseh") claim descent from one of the Ten Lost Tribes of Israel who were sent into exile by the Assyrian Empire more than 27 centuries ago. They have continued to practise Judaism, including observing the Sabbath, keeping kosher, celebrating the festivals and following the laws of family purity.

The News in Brief

Canada

Cream Cheese Recall

OTTAWA — The Canadian Food Inspection Agency (CFIA) has issued a recall alert for two Western brand kosher cream cheese products that may be contaminated with salmonella. Western Original Cream Cheese in a 250-gram container (best before Dec 28 and with the UPC code 0 61641 00006) and Western Light Cream Cheese, also in a 250-gram container (best before Dec. 28 and with the UPC code 0 61641 01550 1) were distributed in Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. There have been no reported illnesses associated with them, the CFIA said in a release.

Dreidel Rock

TORONTO — As part of its Classic Rock Weekends series and in honour of Chanukah, radio station Q107 in Toronto dedicated this past weekend to "rockers with Jewish heritage." The classic rock station's "And the Dreidel Will Rock" weekend featured bands with Jewish members, such as Kiss, with Gene Simmons; Rush, with Geddy Lee; and Van Halen, with David Lee Roth

World

Teacher Remanded

SYDNEY, Australia — A former Jewish studies teacher was remanded to custody to await sentencing on Dec. 22 for his part in a global child porn ring. Paul Benjamin, 41, a one-time deputy principal of Jewish studies at the Emanuel School, appeared in a Sydney court Dec. 4. Benjamin was one of 22 men arrested last December in a bust of a child porn ring involving people in more than 50 countries. He pleaded guilty. He resigned from the school after his arrest and is not believed to have been involved in illegal activity while there.

Carter Adviser Dies

LOS ANGELES — Edward Sanders, who played a key role in the 1979 Israel-Egypt peace treaty as senior Middle East adviser to U.S. president Jimmy Carter, died Dec. 7 at 87 of cancer. Sanders, a successful attorney, led the National Conference of Christians and Jews, American Israel Public Affairs Committee and the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

Activist Slurs Jews

SAN JUAN — An activist in Puerto Rico called for a boycott of local Jewish businesses, saying a primate-breeding facility approved for construction there is one of many "Jewish economic interests." Bioculture Ltd., a firm based in Mauritius, in Africa, with monkey-breeding facilities at 19 sites worldwide, has secured permits for a facility in the southeastern town of Guayama. It expects to start operating next summer. Activist Robert Brito was quoted in local newspapers blaming Jews for past environmental offences and erroneously calling Bioculture an "Israeli company" and that "bringing a facility for wild monkeys from Israel to Guayama constitutes ethnic discrimination against Puerto Ricans who live in Guayama."

Goldstone Frustration

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Goldstone report drove Israelis and Palestinians apart, Assistant U.S. Secretary of State P.J. Crowley said. The aside in a Dec. 8 briefing for reporters was the clearest signal of U.S. frustration with the UN Human Rights Council report into last winter's Gaza war, authored by South African Justice Richard Goldstone, which urged war crimes charges against Israel and Hamas.

Grocer Sues 'Bruno'

NEW YORK —A Palestinian grocer is suing actor Sacha Baron Cohen for $115 million (US) over his portrayal in Bruno. Ayman Abu Aita filed the lawsuit in the United States against the film's producers and Cohen. In Bruno, Ayman Abu Aita, a Christian peace activist, escorted Cohen's alter-ego Bruno, a gay fashion journalist, to a Lebanese refugee camp. Abu Aita was identified as "terrorist group leader, Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade." Abu Aita says he has received death threats over the movie, adding he didn't realize Cohen was an actor filming a comedy and that he misled him, saying the film would help the Palestinians. Aita was in the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades from 2000 to 2003, then spent two years in an Israeli jail for shooting at Israeli soldiers. He now represents the Fatah party in the West Bank town of Beit Sahor.

Oren Raps J Street

NEW YORK — Israel's U.S. ambassador blasted J Street, saying the pro-Israel left-wing group is "fooling around with the lives of seven million people." Michael Oren, responding to a question at a Dec. 7 appearance at the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism's biennial convention, said the group is "a unique problem in that it not only opposes one policy of one Israeli government, it opposes all policies of all Israeli governments. It's significantly out of the mainstream," the Forward reported. Among the issues he cited were J Street's criticism of Israel's attack on Gaza last winter, its refusal to reject the Goldstone report and its failure to back more sanctions on Iran. The same day, J Street said it now backs sanctions by Congress.

Politician Helped Draft Slave Labour Deal

Otto Graf Lambsdorff

BERLIN — Otto Graf Lambsdorff, a key architect of Germany's landmark slave labour compensation deal, died Dec. 5 at a hospital in Bonn at age 82.

In 1999, then-chancellor Gerhard Schroeder tapped Lambsdorff to head the German delegation in slave-labour compensation talks. In 1988, he had been named chair of the liberal Free Democratic Party, his reputation rehabilitated one year after being convicted in a bribery scandal. He served as economics minister from 1977 to 1984.

"Lambsdorff was instrumental in bringing to culmination a German federal law that [since its enactment in 2000] has… ensured compensation for 1,660,000 survivors of the Nazi regime's brutal slave and forced labour programs," the American Jewish Committee said in a statement honouring him. It called him "one of Germany's most outstanding politicians of the post-World War II era."

Academics, leaders address issue of anti-Semitism

Parliamentary committee hears testimony

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Jewish community leaders, academics and professionals recently testified at the seventh hearing of a parliamentary committee about what they view as the new anti-Semitism: anti-Zionism.

The Canadian Parliamentary Coalition for Combating Antisemitism (CPCCA) inquiry committee has been holding hearings on Parliament Hill since Nov. 2. Both Jews and non-Jews, including students, have been testifying and making recommendations about how to respond to anti-Semitism in Canada.

The seventh hearing on Dec. 7 included the witnesses McGill University history professor Gil Troy; University of Ottawa law professor Karen Eltis; Canadian Civil Liberties Association general counsel, Nathalie Des Rosiers; Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW) president, Denis Lemelin; Canadian Centre for Diversity's vice-president of programs, Carla Wittes; Canadian Jewish Congress president, Mark Freiman, and Quebec Jewish Congress president, Adam Atlas.

Mark Freiman

Freiman said that the new anti-Semitism has been redefined. "Instead of the Jewish religion or the Jewish race or the Jewish culture of decadence or Jewish financial influence, the target is now often redefined as the Jewish state, and, of course, the 'international Jews' who support it," he said.

"The cause no longer calls itself anti-Semitism, but rather anti-Zionism and its new alibi is that what is being targeted is not individual Jews, nor Judaism as religion, but rather the alleged misdeeds of the state founded by Jews as a Jewish national homeland."

Eltis said that when it comes to differentiating between anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism, "de-linking the Jewish people from its homeland can amount to a denial of the very identity of the Jewish people."

She added that anti-Semitism, which targets both individual Jews and the "collective Jew, Israel," has spilled onto Canadian campuses and has created "a hostile environment of intimidation, fear and demonization in which violence, both psychological and physical, is increasingly extended legitimacy and worse… it is increasingly couched in the language of human rights."

She said events such as Israeli Apartheid Week – an annual, weeklong series of anti-Israel events held on campuses worldwide – equate the Jewish state with ideas that Canadians are taught to loathe, such as racism and Nazism.

"The Jewish state, its citizens and supporters, which include, of course, students and faculty, not surprisingly become legitimate targets for demonization and violence."

But Lemelin said that CUPW disagrees with the proposition that anti-Semitism is the same as anti-Zionism.

"CUPW opposes discrimination against Jewish people in any way, shape or form. We believe that the state of Israel has the right to exist," Lemelin said, adding that one of CUPW's goals is to ensure that Palestinians have the right to live as equal members in Israeli society.

Swedish effrontery

From the editor's desk...

The photo inset (left) is of the Hurva Synagogue after the Jordanian army destroyed it on May 30, 1948, two days after the Jews in the Jewish Quarter of the Old City in Jerusalem surrendered to the Jordanian Legion in Israel's War of Independence.

The synagogue was originally built in the early 1700s and served as a focal point for many of the Jews who had lived in the ancient city for hundreds of years. It was destroyed by angry Muslim creditors who had financed its building (hence the name Hurva, which in Hebrew means "destroyed remnant"). The penurious Jewish community that lived there at the time could not repay the loan on time.

The synagogue was rebuilt in 1864 by the followers of the famous Vilna Ga'on.

According to Etgar Lefkowitz of the Jerusalem Post, "It [the synagogue] was a focal point of Jewish spiritual and cultural life in Jerusalem. It hosted the installation of the Ashkenazi chief rabbis of Palestine, and the historic addresses by Theodor Herzl at the turn of the century and by Rabbi Avraham Yitzhak Hacohen Kook over the fate of European Jewry before the outbreak of World War II."

Its distinctive dome was a landmark of the Jerusalem skyline. It was noted far and wide for its elegant, splendidly appointed interior and its many fine works of Judaica, including a large platinum menorah.

Before the Jordanians destroyed the synagogue, they stole the Judaica.

Indeed, along with the Hurva synagogue, the Jordanian army destroyed some 30 other synagogues in the Old City of Jerusalem.

They destroyed them all.

Not satisfied with razing all of the places of worship, they vandalized and demolished nearly every vestige of Jewish life in the Old City, including Jewish gravestones, which they used as paving stones on roads and for flooring in latrines. (See photo on right.) They were quite deliberate and purposeful in their destruction. It was not, as we would call the unavoidable fallout from war, "collateral damage."

According to Lefkowitz, the Jordanian commander who led the operation reportedly told his superiors, "For the first time in 1,000 years not a single Jew remains in the Jewish Quarter. Not a single building remains intact. This makes the Jews' return here impossible."

Not surprisingly, that Jordanian commander was proved wrong, as have all Arab leaders and nationalists been proved wrong regarding their sneering dismissal of the Jewish connection to the Land of Israel. The Jews did return.

And now, symbolic of the restoration of Jewish life in the Old City of Jerusalem, and indeed in Israel itself, the Hurva synagogue will be reopening early in the new year. With the help of the Jerusalem Foundation and countless private donors from around the world, it has been restored to the house of prayer that it was before the Jordanians destroyed it.

It is important to note the history of the Hurva as a relevant historic backdrop to the egregiously misplaced remonstrating of the Swedish government last week, and in particular of its foreign minister, Carl Bildt.

Ha'aretz reported that Bildt had warned that Israel must not play "divide and rule" with the 27-member European Union over the resolution adopted last Tuesday calling for Jerusalem to become the shared capital of Israel and a future Palestinian state.

The European foreign ministers had voted to soften somewhat the Swedish proposal that had urged the redivision of Jerusalem, expressly recognizing east Jerusalem as the capital of a Palestinian state. To allow the Swedes to save face, the press statement that accompanied the vote stated: "The EU will not recognize any changes to the pre-1967 borders, including with regard to Jerusalem, other than those agreed by the parties."

Acknowledging the need to have the parties agree to the final borders realigned the EU proposal to the historical western approach to the resolving the conflict, that is, direct negotiations between the parties.

The re-emphasized reference to "pre-1967 borders including with regard to Jerusalem" was a nod in the direction of the Palestinians. Nodding toward the Palestinians, of course, was a slap in the face of Jewish history.

The ethnic cleansing in 1948 by the Jordanians of any Jewish presence in Jerusalem's Old City ultimately failed.

It was always doomed to fail. The absence of Jews in Old Jerusalem lasted "only" 19 years. Jews returned to Jerusalem not as conquerers. Jews returned as children, family coming home because Jerusalem had always been our home.

Foreign Minister Bildt warned the Jews against dividing the EU. He found neither irony, nor diplomatic dissonance, nor wilful blindness to history, nor any shame, in assiduously trying to redivide Jerusalem.

When the Hurva reopens, perhaps he should be invited? – MBD

Iran poses no existential threat: ex-Mossad director

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Contrary to the anxiety of many Israeli politicians, Iran doesn't pose an existential threat to Israel, says the former director of the Mossad, Israel's external intelligence agency.

Speaking at Beth Sholom Synagogue last week, Efraim Halevy adopted an upbeat approach, describing Israel as extremely strong and indestructible.

Halevy, who joined the Mossad in 1961 and headed it from 1998 to 2002, cautioned that Iran, rather than Israel, should be concerned about its future.

In a menacing allusion to the possibility that Israel might well bomb Iran's budding nuclear weapon sites one day, he said, "There is great fear and uncertainty in Iran as to what Israel might do.

"We are capable of things the Iranians fear," added Halevy, whose appearance here was under the auspices of Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

Halevy said he agreed with Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak's most recent assessment on Iran. In an interview with the Israeli newspaper Yediot Achronot on the eve of Rosh Hashanah, Barak said Iran would not be an existential threat to Israel's existence even if it acquired a nuclear arsenal.

Efraim Halevy

Anchoring his remarks to Barak's analysis, Halevy said, "Israel today is indestructible. It's not possible to destroy Israel. Israel today has an array of offensive and defensive abilities that make its destruction impossible."

Yet in a sober aside, he warned that while Iran cannot destroy Israel, Tehran can cause "grievous harm" should the Iranian armed forces retaliate in response to an Israeli strike on Iran's nuclear facilities.

Saying that Israel has evolved into "a formidable country" in terms of its military prowess, Halevy tried to dampen concerns that Israel is vulnerable. As he put it, "Israel is here to stay, and will stay forever. This is seeping into the mind of our enemies."

This mindset accounts for the fact that Egypt and Jordan signed a peace treaty with Israel and that Saudi Arabia has expressed a readiness to come to terms with Israel if it agrees to withdraw to the pre-1967 armistice lines, suggested Halevy, who is currently chair of the Israel Intelligence Heritage and Commemoration Center and head of the Shasha Center for Strategic Studies at the Federman School of Public Policy at Hebrew University.

"Even Hamas, in its heart, understands that Israel is here to stay."

Disclosing that he devoted half his waking hours to the Iranian file when he headed the Mossad, Halevy said that Iran's current president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, inadvertently helps Israel.

"He is one of the greatest gifts the Almighty has given Israel," he said, adding that the Mossad would have had to invent such a figure if he did not exist.

Referring to Ahmadinejad's repeated calls for Israel's destruction, Halevy caustically remarked, "He has performed an enormous service to Israel by explaining why the world should unite against him. We shouldn't do anything to disturb him."

Observing that Iran has been thrown into a leadership crisis since last June's disputed national elections, Halevy suggested that "the clock has begun to tick," signifying "the end of this regime." But he declined to say when it would fall.

Saying he disagreed with a recent comparison by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu equating the rise of Iran with the emergence of European fascism in the 1930s, Halevy said that Israel cannot be likened to a defenceless Jew and that its capability to protect itself is known far and wide.

Israel is one of the world's most powerful nations and is doing what is necessary to deal with future contingencies. As he said, "We've always met and neutralized threats."

In an implicit reference to the Holocaust, he asserted, "It will never happen again."

Exuding supreme self-confidence, Halevy said that the Jewish People have never been as strong as they are today, notwithstanding the prevalence of anti-Semitism. "We're stronger than ever. This is not just a statement of bravado, but it doesn't mean we should be cocksure or oblivious."

From an operational point of view, however, Israel can't afford to restrain itself, even if Diaspora communities stand to be threatened, he said, citing Hezbollah's bombing of the Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires in the mid-1990s following Israel's assassination of the secretary general of Hezbollah in southern Lebanon.

Saying that Israel focuses on "conflict management" rather than "conflict resolution," Halevy cast doubt on the chances of an Israeli peace agreement with the Palestinians any time soon. "Conditions for peace don't exist now."

But if negotiations with the Palestinians resume, Israel would be negotiating from a position of strength rather than weakness, he said.

Even if both sides manage to sign an accord, the Palestinians would not be able to implement it due to the tenuous nature of its leadership. It would thus remain a "shelf agreement."

Within the spirit of conflict management, Israel should try to reach an accommodation with the Palestinians. As part of this process, Israel should be prepared to give up "dear tracts of land."

Calling negotiations a component of conflict management, Halevy said that talks tend to lower the level of violence and hostility and lay the groundwork for future co-operation.

Parliamentarians seek answers

Some 10 months ago, a group of 125 legislators from nearly 40 countries met in London for the inaugural conference of the Inter-parliamentary Committee for Combating Antisemitism. Eleven Canadian Members of Parliament attended that conference. Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney and Liberal MP Irwin Cotler were instrumental in forging Canadian participation in London.

After the delegation returned to Canada, it was sufficiently motivated by the presentations they heard in London and by the urgency of the need to deal with resurgent anti-Semitism, to form the very next month, in March, the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Antisemitism (CPCCA).

CPCCA comprises 22 parliamentarians from all parties in the House of Commons. The coalition has two committees: an inquiry panel, chaired by Liberal MP Mario Silva and a steering committee chaired by Conservative MP Scott Reid. As its website explains, the group exists "for the stated purpose of confronting and combating antisemitism in Canada today." The coalition zealously guards its independence and explicitly states that it is "not affiliated with the government of Canada, any NGO, or any advocacy group."

The coalition began its work on June 2 with a call for written submissions. In response it received nearly 200. Four months later, on Nov. 2, it began public hearings with a plan to complete them after eight sessions. Last week, three more days of witness sessions were scheduled in the new year in order to hear from Canadian university presidents and law enforcement officials. (Please see the related story on page 3.) The committee has promised to submit a report to the government of Canada on its findings.

In his column last week, Prof. Gil Troy, wrote about the work of the CPCCA. (Troy also testified before the coalition last week.)

He expressed the hope that the hearings will help Canadians "understand the historical pathology of anti-Semitism" as well as learn from its "modern mutation," anti-Zionism.

The coalition has marshalled the prestige and the resources of a non-partisan, all-party committee to oppose the bias and the bigotry that attempts to pass – fraudulently – as mere criticism of the Jewish state but which in truth transfers age-old calumny and hatred of the individual Jew to the state of the Jews.

The coalition began its work by pronouncing that "Anti-Semitism by its nature is fundamentally opposed to the multicultural identity of Canada and to the Canadian values of human rights and human dignity."

The work of CPCCA, therefore, not only aims to root out anti-Semitism from within our midst. It strives also to protect the integrity of Canadian society.

"Canada deserves praise for launching these important hearings," Troy wrote in The CJN. We agree.

Quotes from Marx decontextualized

Sally Zerker's guest voice, "Anti-Zionist Jewish leftists are part of a line stretching back to Marx" (Nov. 26), is misinformed, in particular, about Karl Marx and his work. She could have consulted many Israeli politicians and public intellectuals, notably Shlomo Avineri, a former Knesset member and one of the foremost authorities in the world on Marx's prodigious output. As well, Marx's early piece, On the Jewish Question, is a scathing indictment of anti-Semitism, as it appeared in the form of a book by his fellow Hegelian, Bruno Bauer. The quotes she attributes to Marx are generally considered – by Avineri, Hal Draper and other democratic socialists – to be a sarcastic caricature of Bauer's book The Jewish Question. The sum total of this early essay is a critique of the idea, shared by some of Marx's comrades, that fighting for particular rights (Jewish emancipation in Prussia) would be a distraction against the fight for democracy and against "alienation." Marx disputes this idea strongly. The piece in its entirety can be found, along with all of Marx's collected works (as well as works by Avineri), at www.marxists.org.

Social democrats behind Israel

It would be grossly unfair to categorize leftists in general as anti-Zionist, but Sally Zerker is correct in tracing those who are all the way back to Marx ("Anti-Zionist Jewish leftists are part of a line stretching back to Marx, Nov. 26). She is also accurate in characterizing groups such as the Bund as hostile. However, she fails to take into account the social democrats who were supportive of Israel.

True, Zionism did not start as a leftist movement, but as the pressure to create a Jewish state increased, Jewish leftists were at the forefront of the struggle, and not just in Europe. We had in South America a very strong Zionist movement, constituted in great part by leftist youth, contributing personally to kibbutzim and the army.

Neo-Nazi organizations a threat

Mindy Alter's letter, "Rights act and Islamic 'hate speech'" (Nov. 26), claiming that "Nazis pose no threat to us" comes as the Jewish communities in Calgary, Barrie, London and Oshawa clean the filth of swastikas from their houses of worship and places of residence. It comes, also, as the Calgary Police Service continues to search for Aryan Guard member Kyle McKee, who is facing charges of attempted murder after two pipe bombs exploded in a residential neighbourhood. Alter may take some comfort that the target of McKee's efforts was not a member of the Jewish community, but I think that having a neo-Nazi organization in Calgary with the means and motivation to build and deliver an explosive device represents a level of threat that should not be ignored.

Admittedly, these incidents do not fall within the ambit of the Canadian Human Rights Commission or its provincial counterparts, but it takes a rosy pair of glasses to imply that there is no connection between hateful speech and hateful action. None of this is to minimize the threat that is posed by radical elements within the Muslim community or their fellow travellers, but Alter's view, that the Canadian Jewish Congress is ignoring this threat, is inaccurate in the extreme.

Islamists pose the real threat

Mindy Alter's letter, "Rights act and Islamic 'hate speech'" (Nov. 26), accurately paints a new reality in which Islamists pose the real threat to our safety, security and values. She also correctly explains that the Canadian Jewish Congress is missing the point by continuing to see the world through binoculars made in 1939.

'Inflammatory' flyers

I take strong exception to the Liberal candidate's position on the "inflammatory" flyers sent out by the Tories ("Inflammatory rhetoric for political gains," letters, Dec. 3). I was a recipient of one of these flyers, as well as flyers sent out by letter writer Karen Mock and the Liberals. What is it in the Tories' flyer that is inflammatory? What does Mock, who is the Liberal candidate for Thornhill riding, mean when she says the Liberals support Israel? How many times did the Liberals vote in the United Nations against or abstained on Israel resolutions. I can recall the Liberals only voting once in support of Israel. I wonder who is really using tactics for political gain. To me, it seems like the Liberals.

Settlers step up protests, but Netanyahu politically strong

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

In the wake of the Israeli government's freeze on building in West Bank settlements, Jewish settlers are planning widespread protests and demonstrations, including blocking roads in Israel proper.

Their aim is to delegitimize the freeze decision among the wider Israeli public. The danger for the settlers, however, is if they are perceived as too extreme, their actions could actually hurt their public standing.

In a campaign reminiscent of actions by the far right in the aftermath of the Oslo agreements in the mid-1990s and the run-up to the Gaza pullout in 2005, young radical settlers plan to keep the police guessing as they turn up randomly at major thoroughfares at different times to block the traffic.

Their first target was traffic to and from Jerusalem, where dozens of settler youths were quickly dispersed by police Dec. 7 after trying to block the main entrance to the city.

Settler youths also have been at the forefront of moves to harass government inspectors entering settlements to issue warrants against further building. In several cases, this has led to violent confrontations between settlers and police protecting the inspectors.

The worst settler violence, however, has been against Palestinians. In what they call "the price tag" policy, extremists attack nearby villages whenever they feel the government is trying to restrict settlement in any way. Over the Dec. 5-6 weekend, settlers rampaged through the village of Einbus, near Nablus, torching vehicles and setting a home on fire.

Settler leaders have spoken out against violence.

Dani Dayan, head of the Judea and Samaria Settler Council, warned settlers Dec. 8 to keep the protest campaign free of violence, partly for moral reasons and partly in order not to alienate the vast bulk of non-settler Israelis.

But the settler leaders aren't fully in control of the situation, and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has warned the settler community not to cross the fine line between legitimate protest action and open rebellion. And while the mood is not as ominous as it was in the days leading up to the Rabin assassination in 1995, the Shin Bet security service has intensified its already close protection of the prime minister.

Besides the protests and demonstrations, the settlers plan legal and political action against the freeze. They have petitioned the Supreme Court, arguing that the authorities had no right to implement a political freeze without the settlers first being given a hearing.

Their main hope, though, is in the political arena, where the settlers are banking on a rebellion within the Likud Party. Although the two most hawkish parties in the government, Yisrael Beiteinu and Jewish Home, have expressed deep sympathy for the settlers, they show no sign of bolting the coalition over the freeze.

Inside Likud, there has been a degree of unrest, as government ministers and Knesset members criticized the freeze as antithetical to party ideology. No one, however, has threatened to resign over it, and the chances of a full-scale rebellion within the party – like the one against Ariel Sharon over the Gaza disengagement in 2005 – are remote.

In 2005, Sharon found himself under attack from leading Likudniks such as Uzi Landau and Netanyahu himself, who were ready to resign their ministerial posts to throw in their lot with the settler cause. That's not the case today, and there seems to be little likelihood of Netanyahu's government being shaken by internal party ferment.

Nevertheless, given the threat, Netanyahu has been working hard to cultivate wide party support. He has been able to play on the trauma of the break with Sharon and to urge the rebels not to take action that again could split the party.

His second argument has been to stress that the freeze is only for 10 months and won't be repeated. On the contrary, Netanyahu says, as soon as it lapses, building will be resumed at an accelerated rate.

The prime minister also assured would-be rebels Dec. 6 that there would be no second Gaza-style withdrawal, and that the future of the West Bank would be decided only in a final peace deal with the Palestinians, who thus far are showing no interest in making peace.

More than 10,000 right-wing activists gathered near the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem Dec. 9 to demonstrate against the 10-month freeze in settlement construction announced in November.
[Israel Sun photos]

Apart from the fact that no ministers or Knesset members have walked out on him, Netanyahu has received strong backing from some 50 of the Likud's veteran mayors. His position in the party seems unassailable.

Despite all the settler agitation, the government has been unwavering in its determination to implement the freeze. It has taken satellite photographs of the region to make it easy to pick up any new building, and mobilized dozens of inspectors to monitor the situation on a daily basis. Seasoned officers in the Israel Defence Forces say that for the first time, the government has issued clear and serious instructions on how to implement a building freeze.

The big question, though, is how serious Netanyahu is about using the freeze as a springboard for cutting a deal with the Palestinians. Serious implementation of the freeze doesn't necessarily mean serious strategic intent, and several leading pundits see the freeze as nothing more than a tactic to blame the Palestinians for failure to make peace. Netanyahu himself has hinted as much, adding that the freeze also was necessary to get America in Israel's corner on other key issues, such as Iran.

His message to the settlers seems to be to wait out the 10 months, during which time nothing will happen on the Palestinian front, and then, together with the government, they can go back to the business of settlement building.

The trouble is, the settlers don't trust Netanyahu and fear that under pressure from the international community, he will sell them out and the freeze will serve to prepare public opinion for a territorial compromise with the Palestinians, at their expense.

U.S. not opposed to Israel adding funds for settlements

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's decision to seek cabinet approval for a new map of "national priority" zones does not contradict Israel's declaration of a 10-month construction freeze in West Bank settlements, the Prime Minister's Bureau assured senior U.S. administration officials late last Thursday.

The new map would enable 110,000 settlers – most of whom live outside the major settlement blocs – to receive the economic benefits conferred on residents of zones already included on Israel's list.

Senior U.S. administration officials told Ha'aretz that the Prime Minister's Bureau had provided satisfactory explanations, as long as the benefits plan was in keeping with the freeze and that money would not be transferred for new housing in the settlements.

All Labor party ministers were expected to vote against the proposed revision of the country's national priority zones at Sunday's cabinet meeting. The ministers are objecting to the fact that the new map confers national priority status on several isolated settlements.

"Such a move contradicts the desire to divide the land under a future peace agreement. But in everything related to advancing the Negev and the Galilee, the map has clear advantages [over the one currently in force]," said Welfare Minister Isaac Herzog.

In related news, the British government has issued an official recommendation urging business owners to mark Israeli products from West Bank settlements so that consumers who want to boycott such items will find it easy to identify them.

The recommendation is not binding, but this step marks an escalation in the country's attitude toward Israel's settlements.

According to European Union law, many types of products, especially food products, that are imported from outside the Union, by law must be labelled with the country of their origin. The British government issued its recommendation after several NGOs and marketing chains asked for guidelines regarding the differentiation between settler products and Palestinian products from the West Bank.

According to the new guidelines, the British government recommends indicating whether the product was made by Palestinians or Israeli settlers on the label of every product originating from the West Bank.

The government recommendation goes further to say that labelling a product from a settlement as having been manufactured in Israel would be considered a criminal offence, as it is misleading to the consumer public.

Israel's Foreign Ministry said that this was a severe escalation of the existing protocols regarding the labelling of West Bank products, adding that the recommendation promotes boycotts of Israeli products.

"This only harms the Middle East peace process, and will hinder Israel's and the world's efforts to renew the diplomatic process at such a critical stage, and that is doubly disappointing," said Foreign Ministry official Yossi Levy.

The British Embassy in Israel issued a statement clarifying that the move was not a boycott. "This is a recommendation, not a binding order," the embassy said. "The British government is opposed to any kind of boycott of Israel."

The rising tide of Jewish apathy

On a recent visit to Toronto, the chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel, Natan Sharansky, drew attention to the disturbing increase in disaffection with Israel among young Jews in Diaspora communities.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

And while generational rifts in attitudes toward Jewish statehood have been observed for decades, recent studies have again highlighted the scope and seriousness of the phenomenon.

In Beyond Distancing: Young American Jews and Their Alienation from Israel, researchers Steven Cohen and Ari Kelman report on a sampling of opinions derived from a national survey of American Jewish households. From the broad range of questions that were asked, there is evidence that, compared to older respondents, young Jews are generally less attached to, supportive of and engaged with Israel. Perhaps most shocking among the findings is the revelation that almost 50 per cent of participants under age 35 indicated that they wouldn't regard Israel's destruction as a personal tragedy.

In a post-modernist world where universal issues of social justice invariably trump Jewish particularity and where assimilation into a host culture has come to be regarded as the most comfortable and desirable of possible objectives, it's not especially surprising that Zionism has come to represent an anachronism, if not an outright source of embarrassment for growing numbers – though still a minority – of our younger generation.

Sharansky himself takes this one step further when expressing his concern that Israel's enemies try to exploit signs of apathy among Jews to "delegitimize Israel and weaken the connection between Israel and the Jewish people."

What is apparent, however, is that the growing indifference toward Israel will likely accelerate unless creative ways are found that speak more convincingly to young members of our communities. Old paradigms that rely heavily on unquestioning emotional and financial support for Israel and an absolutist preoccupation with Holocaust commemoration need to be reviewed within the context of changing perceptions and expectations.

Fresh approaches that focus on intrinsic Jewish values and Jewish peoplehood – which have been found to correlate strongly with support for Israel – need to become more prominent at all levels of Jewish education.

Furthermore, as Cohen and Kelman found, it's notable that an important predictor for attachment to Israel is travel to Israel. This was shown for all age categories, but was most pronounced in the younger demographic. Regardless of motivation, even a single trip – taken at any point in one's life – results in less alienation from Israel.

An intensive effort is needed to stem the rising tide of Jewish apathy. It's now up to our communal leadership to meet this challenge.

Israel takes risk for peace

By MICHAEL B. OREN

Michael B. Oren in Washington, D.C.

Distracted by the crucial debate over Afghanistan, many Americans may have missed a pivotal event in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. On Nov. 25, Israel's government announced a 10-month construction freeze in Judea and Samaria – the areas generally known as the West Bank. Though some projects already begun will be completed and essential public buildings like medical clinics and schools will be approved, no new housing permits will be issued.

"We hope that this decision will help launch meaningful peace negotiations," Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu declared, "and finally end the conflict between the Palestinians and Israel."

The administration of U.S. President Barack Obama praised the decision and recognized its significance. Special envoy George Mitchell hailed the decision as "substantial," and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton called it "unprecedented."

By contrast, Palestinian leaders rejected Israel's gesture as grossly inefficient. Without an indefinite cessation of all Jewish building in the West Bank and Jerusalem, they say, peace talks cannot resume.

What Mitchell and Clinton understand, but the Palestinians miss, is that Netanyahu has shown more flexibility on this issue than any previous head of his Likud party, which is staunchly pro-settlement. Indeed, he has gone further than any prime minister in limiting a right that many Israelis consider incontestable and a vital component of their national security.

Twice – in 1948 and 1967 – the West Bank served as the staging ground for large-scale attacks against Israel. While defending itself, Israel captured the territory and reunited with its ancestral homeland: Haifa is not in the Bible, but Bethlehem, Hebron and Jericho decidedly are. Hundreds of thousands of Israelis rushed to resettle their tribal land.

These communities widened Israel's borders, which at some points are a mere eight miles wide. American policy-makers recognized Israel's need for defensible borders and, in November 1967, they supported UN Resolution 242, which called for withdrawals from "territories" captured, but not from "all the territories" or even "the territories."

All successive Israeli governments supported the settlements. Only with the signing of the 1993 Oslo accords did then-prime minister Yitzhak Rabin agree to restrain construction in outlying communities that he considered unnecessary for Israel's defence. But the settlements continued to expand. Meanwhile the peace process progressed. The Palestinians never made a construction freeze in Jerusalem and the settlements a precondition for talks – until earlier this year.

Netanyahu initially responded that Jews, like all people, can build legally in Jerusalem, and that it's unreasonable to disallow settlers from building even an extra room for a newborn. Still, he promised not to establish new settlements, not to appropriate additional land for existing ones, nor even to induce Israelis to move to them. Yet the Palestinians balked. The peace process was moribund, awaiting an intrepid stroke.

Netanyahu has now taken that initiative. By suspending new Israeli construction in all of the West Bank, he has done what none of his predecessors, including Rabin, ever suggested.

At home, Netanyahu's decision has been fiercely criticized, even by some members of his own party. The Knesset has considered a vote of no-confidence in his leadership. And the most recent poll shows that more Israelis oppose the freeze than support it.

The prime minister has nevertheless persisted – his coalition is among the strongest and most representative in Israel's history – but the opportunity generated by his action will not endure indefinitely. Together with the Obama administration, which has repeatedly asserted its commitment to restarting talks without preconditions and to achieving a permanent two-state solution, Israelis hope that Palestinians will once again join them in talks.

By taking risks and accomplishing the unprecedented, Netanyahu has demonstrated his commitment to peace. Now the Palestinians must match that dedication and seize this propitious moment.

Michael Oren is Israel's ambassador to the United States. This essay first appeared in the Wall Street Journal.

Is the occupation just an excuse?

If settlements and the "occupation" were to suddenly end, would the condemnations and demonization of Israel also stop? An increasing number of Israelis would answer "no" to this question. Evidence indicates that rather than defend Israel's right to exist, many activists, journalists and academics would continue the vilification, even in the absence of post-1967 settlements or settlers.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

One of the main manifestations of this unlimited Israel-bashing is the "BDS" (boycotts, divestment and sanctions) movement, which uses terms like "apartheid" and "racist." Rallies and conferences that promote these themes are organized by non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and often funded by European governments (Canada has ended this practice), under the façade of promoting peace and human rights.

In parallel, Israeli defences against terrorism are condemned as "war crimes," while suicide bombings and thousands of rocket attacks by Hamas, Hezbollah and other groups are given the status of "resistance." This immoral inversion is perpetuated in the United Nations' Goldstone report on Israel's conduct during the Gaza war, and by campaigns of purported "human rights" organizations. An anti-Israel theme dominates the media in newspapers such as the Guardian, the articles of Robert Fisk (often republished in the Canadian press), and, to a significant degree, BBC reports.

The focus of their rage isn't Israel's policy in dealing with the occupied territories, but rather the existence of the Jewish nation-state itself. Their real goal is to reverse the establishment of sovereign equality for the Jewish people. This goal is also at the core of conspiracy theorists such as Stephen Walt and John Mearsheimer in their modern version of the Protocols of Elders of Zion.

In order to promote and justify this objective of demonization, the history and context of the Arab-Israel conflict has been rewritten and falsified. In this version, found in many universities and among the anti-Zionist radical left, the "occupied territory" is all of Israel.

Adopting the Arab and Muslim fictions, the 4,000-year-old Jewish presence in the Land of Israel has been replaced by the myth that Israel is part of a European colonialist invasion, while Palestinian Muslims are relabelled as "indigenous peoples." In refusing to consider any compromise to end the conflict at the 2000 Camp David summit, then-Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat insisted that there was no Jewish Temple in Jerusalem. This is the dominant view, not only among Palestinians and Arabs, but also among their supporters in the West.

To cite one example of this ludicrous fiction, Jay Johnson, a geographer from the University of Kansas, recently cancelled an event in Israel on the grounds that "it's inappropriate to go onto territory claimed by indigenous people," meaning the Palestinians, and not the Jews. To support this inversion, Johnson quotes Neve Gordon, from Ben-Gurion University in Be'er Sheva and a favourite of the BDS proponents.

Another manifestation of this delegitimization is the support for what is known as the "one-state solution," meaning the elimination of Israel and its absorption into an Arab-majority state of Palestine. A series of pseudo-academic conferences were held promoting this theme, including one hosted by York and Queen's universities. The "one-state" solution has been the main Arab and Palestinian objective since the rejection of the November 1947 UN Partition Resolution, and continues to be pressed through the use of refugee claims (the so-called "right of return" sought for millions of Arabs).

On this basis, many Israelis now conclude that there's nothing to be gained, in terms of legitimacy and acceptance, by the creation of a Palestinian state and the painful process of withdrawal from the West Bank. Concessions on Israel's part will not end the ideological campaigns and demonization, according to the pattern seen following the withdrawal from Gaza in 2005. Israel would only be even more vulnerable to terror attacks, resulting in more casualties and false accusations of "war crimes" by Goldstone's successors.

Perhaps this is an unwarranted and overly pessimistic conclusion, and the world would embrace an Israel that "put an end to the occupation." The evidence, however, points in the other direction.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

On Chanukah, the Festival of Lights, let this eclectic selection of books illuminate your path toward greater knowledge.

Israel's political and military struggle with the Palestinians is a running sore in the Middle East, a tragedy that seems to have lasted forever and defies a non-violent solution. Ian Bickerton's accessible primer, The Arab-Israeli Conflict: A History (The University of Chicago Press), delves deeply into this tangled dispute and covers the British mandate, the wars, the skirmishes and the diplomacy. His sensible message is that the dispute cannot be resolved by military means.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Start-Up Nation: The Story of Israel's Economic Miracle (McClelland & Stewart), by Dan Senor and Saul Singer, is a portrait of a besieged country whose achievements in high-tech research and development are out of all proportion to its size. The authors claim that Israel represents "the greatest concentration of innovation and entrepreneurship in the world today."

Jeremy Salt's The Unmaking of the Middle East: A History of Western Disorder in Arab Lands (University of California Press) is both a non-conformist analysis of western intervention in this strategic region since Ottoman times and a critical examination of Israel's policies toward its Arab neighbours.

Iraq matters, as Hans J. Nissen and Peter Heine suggest in From Mesopotamia to Iraq: A Concise History (The University of Chicago Press), a volume of sweeping scope that places this pivotal nation in historic perspective. Iraq's turbulent trajectory from city state, empire and Ottoman and British colony to monarchy and republic is succinctly traced.

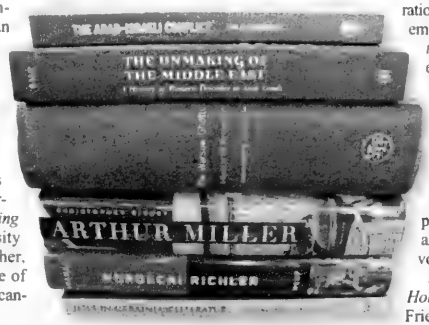
In Unintended Consequences: How the War in Iraq Strengthened America's Enemies (Simon & Schuster), Peter W. Galbraith, a former U.S. diplomat, claims that the United States and its allies miscalculated by invading Iraq in 2003. He argues that the invasion emboldened Iran and Syria, rendered Israel less secure, alienated a key ally, Turkey, and generally undermined American interests in the Mideast.

A recent incident in which a Muslim army captain shot and killed several people on a military base in Texas in the name of jihad aroused anger and indignation but also prompted some commentators to downplay his extreme religious beliefs. Their reaction will surely be fodder for cultural critic Bruce Bawer, whose thoughtful and provocative book, Surrender. Appeasing Islam, Sacrificing Freedom (Doubleday), maintains that fear and political correctness have led journalists, politicians and intellectuals in the United States and Europe to coddle radical Islam at the cost of free speech.

Christopher Dickey, in Securing the City: Inside America's Best Counterterror Force – the NYPD (Simon & Schuster), explains how the New York City police department has transformed itself since 9/11 and the wave of Palestinian suicide attacks against Israel during the second intifadah.

The sheer complexity of contemporary Iran is deftly set out by Iranian American foreign correspondent Azadeh Moaveni in Honeymoon in Tehran (Random House), which is based on her reporting from Iran from 2005 on. Moaveni, whose previous work was Lipstick Jihad, explores Iran from a highly personal point of view.

A distinguished Canadian novelist is the subject of Reinhold Kramer's rigorous biography, Mordecai Richler: Leaving St. Urbain (McGill-Queen's University Press). Kramer, a meticulous researcher, digs deeply, unearthing a motherlode of sparkling nuggets about this talented, cantankerous man.



A heavyweight American literary figure is given respectful biographical treatment by Christopher Bigsby in Arthur Miller (Harvard University Press). Using newly discovered documents, Bigsby sheds light on Miller's evolution as a playwright, his political involvements and his relationship with and marriage to Hollywood goddess Marilyn Monroe.

After the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution, Jewish theatres in the Soviet Union, namely Habima and the Moscow State Yiddish Theatre, became catalysts for modernist experimentation in acting and design by employing such artists as Marc Chagall and Natan Altman. This lively period is recreated in Chagall and the Artists of the Russian Jewish Theater (Yale University Press), consisting of erudite essays edited by Susan Tamarkin Goodman.

N.N. Shneidman's Double Vision: The Jew in Russian Literature, 1991-2006 (Mosaic Press) focuses on works in which Jewish characters appear or Jewish issues are discussed in a changing socio-political landscape.

Billed as a path-breaking work, Jews in Ukrainian Literature: Representation and Identity (Yale University Press) is by Myroslav Shkandrij, a professor of Slavic studies at the University of Manitoba. Synthesizing the most recent material and discussing writers little known or unknown in the west, he challenges the notion that the Ukrainian and Jewish communities were antagonistic toward each other.

A worthy companion volume by Yohanan Petrovsky-Shtern, The Anti-Imperial Choice: The Making of the Ukrainian Jew (Yale University Press), posits the theory that Jews in Ukraine were an integral part of its literary tradition and challenges assumptions about Jewish acculturation and Ukrainian-Jewish relations.

In Bundist Counterculture in Interwar Poland (Syracuse University Press), Jack Jacobs contends that the Jewish workers' Bund, a secular and socialist party, played more of a powerful role in the Jewish community on the eve of World War II than is commonly assumed, notwithstanding its absence from the Sejm, Poland's parliament.

Through Jonathan Webber's informed text and Chris Schwarz's evocative photographs, a vanished world is resuscitated, if only fleetingly. Rediscovering Traces of Memory: The Jewish Heritage of Polish Galicia, published by Indiana University Press on behalf of the Galicia Jewish Museum in Krakow, gives a reader a glimpse of the richness of prewar Jewish life.

Cosmopolitans: A Social & Cultural History of the Jews of the San Francisco Bay Area (University of California Press), by Fred Rosenbaum, is an intriguing case study of a vibrant Jewish community whose origins are bound up with the founding of this city in the mid-19th century. Marching through the narrative is a colourful cast of characters.

Apparently the first book of its kind, Ayala Fader's Mitzvah Girls: Bringing up the Next Generation of Hasidic Jews in Brooklyn (Princeton University Press) bores into a closed community, examining the place of young females in a traditional, male-centred society.

Advertised as the first comprehensive exploration of Jewish social integration in the Roman empire, Seth Schwartz's scholarly work, Were the Jews a Mediterranean Society? (Princeton University Press), deals with the Jews of the Second Temple era.

The Holocaust remains a seemingly endless source of new books.

The Warsaw Ghetto: A Guide to the Perished City (Yale University Press), by Barbara Engelking and Jacek Leociak, is an awe-inspiring, encyclopedic masterpiece of reconstruction. Maps, biographies and a bibliography are included in this hefty volume.

Jewish Refugees in Switzerland During the Holocaust (Valentine Mitchell) is written by Frieda Johles Forman, a Viennese-born Torontonian who spent part of the war in a Swiss internment camp along with her parents and brother. A most interesting account.

Kristallnacht 1938 (Harvard University Press), by Alan E. Steinweiss, examines a catastrophic event through fresh eyes and material. Crossing Hitler: The Man who Put the Nazis on the Witness Stand (Oxford University Press), by Benjamin Carter Hett, recounts a forgotten 1931 trial which pitted a Jewish lawyer against Hitler.

Michael Marrus' Some Measure of Justice: The Holocaust Era Restitution Campaign of the 1990s (University of Wisconsin Press) is a very useful primer on a prime topic.

Moroccan king donates fountain to synagogue

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

About 200 members of Toronto's Moroccan Jewish community braved cold winter winds last week to attend the dedication ceremony of a traditional Moroccan fountain.

The fountain was donated by the Moroccan King Mohammed VI to the Sephardic Kehila Centre.

The Moroccan king's ambassador to Canada, Nouzha Chekrouni, attended the dedication and ribbon-cutting ceremony on Dec. 10 to unveil the colourful mosaic fountain located in the foyer of the synagogue.

"This gift is a tribute to all of you," Chekrouni said.

"Whenever you come to the Kehila Centre, please take a second and stop near the fountain and feel through the flow of water, the everlasting love that links you to your country wherever you are."

Kehila Centre executive vice-president Maurice Benzacar, who acted as the MC, said that 52 years ago, the first wave of Moroccan Jews began settling in Toronto.

"Since then, we were committed to preserving the customs and traditions of our Moroccan heritage," Benzacar said.

"This is a very special gift, a gift that is a testament to the strong cultural ties between the Toronto Moroccan Jewish community and the land of our heritage."

Chief Sephardi Rabbi Amram Assayag, who immigrated to Toronto from Morocco when he was 15 years old, called the dedication a "historical event," and said it "brings back the wonderful memories of our childhood as we walk into a building with such a majestic feature."

Rabbi Assayag said that his community was "privileged" to live in Morocco.

"Our kings were full of understanding and mercy… Moroccan Jewry flourished in a way that very few Diasporas have flourished."

Kehila Centre president Elias Toby said that while the Jewish community in Morocco has dwindled over the past 50 years, "Jewish synagogues and schools continue to receive government subsidies."

He added that "after half a century of separation, the Jews of Morocco are finding their way home. Many of us have recently visited Morocco, and through those visits, we recall and better understand the culture and dimension of being a Sephardic Jew."

Teacher charged with sexual assault

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A popular French teacher at Toronto's Bnei Akiva Schools was charged last week with sexually assaulting a girl between Nov. 26 and Dec. 3.

Jaskaransingh (Jask) Ramburn, 68, appeared in court at 1000 Finch Ave. W. on Dec. 7. He was charged with sexual assault, sexual interference, sexual exploitation and invitation to sexual touching.

Ramburn was released with conditions, Det.-Sgt. Jim Sproxton of Toronto Police Service's 32 division told The CJN last Thursday. A trial date has yet to be determined.

Police are continuing to investigate, mostly in regard to identifying other possible victims, Sproxton added.

Ramburn worked at both branches of the religious Zionist school – Yeshivat Or Chaim, the boys' high school, and Ulpanat Orot, its counterpart for girls.

There were no "allegations, information or knowledge that any misconduct occurred at Bnei Akiva Schools or involving students from Bnei Akiva Schools," Rabbi Scot Berman, Bnei Akiva's headmaster wrote in an e-mail to parents, faculty, board members and students on Dec. 7.

Earlier that day, he learned of the charges when police contacted the school. "Our reaction was one of shock and despair," said the rabbi, who joined the school earlier this year.

Ramburn joined the Bnei Akiva Schools in January 2002, after spending most of his career teaching in Niagara Region public schools. He is currently suspended, pending further investigation.

The rabbi's e-mail, in which he stated that the school's first priority is the safety of its students, was sent as the students were informed of the news in separate assemblies at the two campuses.

As well, the school's social worker, Diane Harvey, who works with Jewish Family & Child, "had assembled her team, and they were there to provide support for students and faculty in the aftermath of the announcement," Rabbi Berman said.

Rabbi Berman encouraged current and former students to come forward with relevant information.

Police are asking anyone with information to contact them at 416-808-3200, or to call Crime Stoppers anonymously at 416-222-TIPS (online at www.222tips.com).

CIDA cuts funding to group labelled anti-Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) has cut off millions of dollars worth of aid to a Christian human rights organization in Toronto that has been accused of pursuing an anti-Israel agenda.

CIDA, which administers foreign aid programs in developing countries in partnership with Canadian organizations, severed its financial relations with KAIROS recently by rejecting its $7-million grant renewal application.

NGO Monitor – a Jerusalem-based group whose objective is to counter non-governmental organizations around the world from promoting anti-Israel campaigns – said that KAIROS supports the Israel divestment and boycott movement in Canada, backs Israel Apartheid Week at Canadian universities and generates hostility to Israel.

KAIROS, an interdenominational church-based group known as the Canadian Ecumenical Justice Initiative, denies these charges. KAIROS spokesperson Adiat Junaid described them as "patently false," saying that "attempts to smear our reputation by making such claims are offensive."

In rejecting the $7 million in funding over four years to KAIROS– which means "the right moment" in ancient Greek – International Co-operation Minister Bev Oda didn't mention its record on Israel.

Instead, she said KAIROS' mandate doesn't meet CIDA's current priorities.

In the past, KAIROS has taken issue with Canadian mining practices abroad and warned of ecological hazards in the extraction of petroleum from the Alberta tar sands. It has also campaigned against the production of bottled water in Canada.

KAIROS' executive director, Mary Corkery, said that while it has called for a negotiated end to Israel's occupation of the West Bank and criticized the construction of the "separation wall" and the building of settlements beyond the Green Line, it supports Israel's existence and its "right to live in peace" and "deplores" violence by Israelis and Palestinians.

KAIROS also favours the creation of "a viable and just Palestinian state."

She added that KAIROS neither supports Israel Apartheid Week nor a boycott of Israel, and will only consider divestment should it be proven that "corporate investments… contribute directly to the suffering" of Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Corkery said that KAIROS has funded projects related to non-violence in greater Jerusalem. She cited a program in which Bat Shalom in western Jerusalem and the Jerusalem Centre for Women in eastern Jerusalem work collectively to promote peace.

Corkery said that KAIROS' criticism of certain Israeli policies is in line with "positions taken regarding human rights concerns in other countries, including Canada, where we have been outspoken on indigenous rights, water, energy, anti-poverty and the rights of migrant workers."

CIDA's funding accounted for about 40 per cent of KAIROS' $4-million annual budget, Corkery said.

KAIROS also receives funding from member groups and churches, foundations, unions and individual donors, and it sometimes gets "project-based grants from other government departments," she added.

CIDA spokesperson Scott Cantin said in an interview that the Canadian "government is taking measures to make Canada's international assistance more focused, more efficient and more accountable. CIDA has focused bilateral aid on 20 countries and [has] established three priority themes: food security, children and youth and sustainable economic growth."

He added, "While we receive many excellent proposals, we cannot possibly fund every one, and we have to make difficult decisions."

After "due diligence," CIDA determined that KAIROS' proposals don't conform with its current priorities, Cantin said.

Nonetheless, several of KAIROS' "member organizations" will continue to receive separate funding from CIDA, he noted.

He wouldn't comment on "rumours" or "proposals under consideration" that Alternatives – a Montreal-based organization that NGO Monitor has also branded as anti-Israel – would no longer receive CIDA funds.

Corkery said KAIROS has yet to obtain a detailed explanation from CIDA on why funding was terminated after a 35-year relationship.

CIDA's decision will force KAIROS to end a number of overseas projects, such as in the Democratic Republic of Congo. But its overall program, particularly its work with Canada's indigenous peoples, will continue, she said.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, said he is pleased by the Ottawa's decision to cut off KAIROS, charging it has diverted CIDA funds into political advocacy that is anti-Israel.

"I like to believe that the government factored this consideration into its calculations," he said.

When Oleg Shteyner lived in Ukraine, and then in Sderot, Judaism was a mystery. When he moved to Canada, it became his passion.

Shteyner, 20, spoke last week at the Orthodox Union Canada and NCSY (National Conference of Synagogue Youth) Canada's gala dinner and concert, where Prime Minister Stephen Harper was honoured.

"I couldn't connect to the Jewish people around me" he said before his speech to an audience of about 1,600 people. "A year ago things changed."

While at Newtonbrook Secondary School in North York, Shteyner joined the Jewish Student Union club, where he began to learn about his religion.

Now, a year later, he keeps kosher, is heavily involved with NCSY Canada, a group that engages Jewish youth through social and recreational activities, and, at the time of his speech, was preparing to undergo a circumcision.

"I'll be both physically and spiritually a part of [Judaism]. It is important to go all the way. Only by that are you able to understand what God is all about," he said.

Harper is the first recipient of the OU/NCSY Outstanding Award of Merit. At the event, he was represented by members of his cabinet.

"Prime Minister Stephen Harper has been a role model for all Canadians," Shteyner said. "He made the decision to support Israel, he is a man of his word."

During the reception and concert, organizers played a video tribute to Harper, which highlighted his condemnation of anti-Semitism and his decision to boycott the Iranian president's speech at the United Nations General Assembly this year.

According to Rabbi Glenn Black, the CEO of NCSY, Harper received the award of merit because of his consistent support of the Jewish community.

"There has never [before] been a prime minister... who has been steadfast in their support of righteousness and freedom," Rabbi Black said about Harper's relationship with Israel. "Israel is a lone democracy in a sea of hatred... [Harper] understands his role is to stand up against the power of evil."

Black, along with Philip Reichmann, the tribute event chair, and Larry Zeifman, the president of OU Canada, met with Harper in Ottawa at the end of last month to present the award to him.

Pierre Poilievre, Harper's parliamentary secretary and Jason Kenney, the minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, spoke at the reception on behalf of the prime minister.

"We're... proud to be part of a government that has taken a zero tolerance approach towards anti-Semitism," Kenney said.

Kenney talked about his experience four years ago at the University of Calgary, where he tried to organize a Solidarity with Israel rally. When he approached a Jewish group on campus, he was surprised by their response.

"They said, 'We don't like to cause trouble, we don't want to be controversial. We have our bagel lunches on Wednesday. That's enough,'" he said.

"I was ashamed to hear that. We need... young Jews who are proud of their identity. I know the youth involved in NCSY are exactly those kinds of young people."

Cynamon and Sokolowski families team up for major gift

$5 million donation will create new Sports Complex on Sherman Campus

By Daniel Horowitz

Two visionary and generous philanthropic families have come together to share their love of sports through UJA's Tomorrow Campaign, and Toronto's Jewish community – and the community at large – will never be the same.

Last week, David Cynamon and Howard Sokolowski announced that their families have made a joint $5 million gift for a new, state-of-the-art sports complex, part of the Prosserman Jewish Community Centre at Bathurst St. and Sheppard Ave.

When completed, the Cynamon/Sokolowski Sports Complex will be a vital part of the Prosserman JCC, which opened its first phase this past fall. The complex will offer a comprehensive, holistic approach to health and wellness for all ages. The facility will include a multi-sport gymnasium, indoor and outdoor pools, including a therapeutic pool for seniors and children, an indoor running track, and a fitness centre.

"This is an extraordinary gift made by philanthropic leaders in our city," said Alan Winer, chair, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "The Cynamon/Sokolowski Sports Complex will embody the generosity, passion for sports, and commitment to community for which the Cynamon and Sokolowski families are renowned."

In fact, both families have distinguished themselves by providing leadership and support for many vital causes. David and Stacey Cynamon have been involved in numerous community endeavours. Howard Sokolowski is a past chair of United Jewish Appeal's annual campaign, while his wife, Senator Linda Frum Sokolowski, is a past chair of UJA's Women's Philanthropy.

"It's been a long process; a long time in the dream stage and now we are in the midst of seeing those dreams come to fruition," said Honey Sherman. "There's no question that the Cynamon and Sokolowski families' efforts are going to go a long way to benefiting not only our community's immediate needs, but our future, as well. Still, as far as we have come, we need the participation of all those within our community who can do so to truly make this dream a reality."

The Cynamon/Sokolowski Sports Complex will be part of the second phase of Sherman Campus, a unique centre of community services located on 27.5 acres adjacent to the Don Valley ravine on Bathurst, north of Sheppard Avenue. The campus includes the Prosserman JCC, The future National Centre for Jewish Heritage, the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, The Koffler Centre of the Arts and the Leah Posluns Theatre.

"Although I'm from Edmonton, I've been coming to the JCC here since I was 17 and I have so many good memories," said Cynamon. "Howard and I really did our homework on this project; it's such an important facility, in the heart of the city, and it feels so good to be able to give back. Sports has a way of bringing people from all backgrounds and experiences together in the pursuit of excellence. My family and I are thrilled to be part of the growth and vibrancy of the Prosserman JCC on Sherman Campus."

"I grew up here at what we all used to call the Northern Y," said a smiling Sokolowski, owner, along with Cynamon, of the Toronto Argonauts. "I have so many great memories of this whole place that when I was given the opportunity to be involved in its revitalization, I simply had to do what I could. This is all about making a first-class facility available to the entire community. And that's precisely what we expect the Cynamon/Sokolowski Sports Complex to be."

"The vision and generosity shown by the Sokolowski and Cynamon families through this gift is remarkable," said Peter Cohen, chair, Sherman Campus Development Project. "The scope of the new Sports Complex that will bear their names will benefit the community-at-large in so many ways, while providing an essential atmosphere of health and wellness to all, and what better way is there to improve a community than that?"

Sherman Campus is part of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's $400 million Tomorrow Campaign, which is building three centres of Jewish life that will serve all residents of the Greater Toronto Area. Chaired by Gerry Schwartz and Larry Tanenbaum, the project is the largest non-profit infrastructure development in Canada.

Full story of Gaza smuggling tunnels goes untold

According to Reports

By Paul Michaels

On Dec. 9, the BBC reported from Cairo that, according to unnamed intelligence sources, Egypt, helped by American army engineers, has started building a 10- to 11-kilometre-long "super-strength steel" wall along its border with Gaza. The barrier is described as extending 18 metres below the surface and is intended to cut the "smuggling tunnels" that run between Egypt and Gaza under the town of Rafa.

But given the magnitude of this 18-month project, it's interesting to note the concluding paragraph in the BBC report: "The wall is not expected to stop all the smuggling, but it will force the Palestinians to go deeper and it will likely cut the hundreds of superficial tunnels closer to the surface that are used to move the bulk of the goods."

In other words, this new, supposedly impenetrable barrier, will only make the tunnels more difficult to build, but will not prevent them from operating.

Jonathan Halevi

According to Jonathan Halevi, a Toronto-based intelligence expert and former adviser for policy planning in Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Egyptians are carrying out a devious policy.

In conversation, Halevi explained: "Egypt is trying to benefit both by appearing to 'fight' the smuggling along the border and letting the border remain virtually open without taking responsibility for the Gaza Strip. Egypt wants that responsibility to remain Israel's burden. This double game must be unveiled.

"Even more ironic is the fact that that while the U.S. government sent Egypt sophisticated devices for spotting tunnels, they can be seen clearly from afar, so the equipment is not even needed. Occasionally, but just for show, the Egyptians blow up or flood an abandoned tunnel here and there, but, according to Palestinian sources, between 500 to 800 tunnels remain actively and openly in business, amounting to about $650 million this year, to both Egypt's and Hamas' benefit."

Halevi added: "The full and proper story about the 'smuggling' operations, which are actually regular import activity, remains to be told."

* * *

In "'Clock for change is ticking' in Iran, former top spy for Israel says" (Globe and Mail Dec. 9), Tu Thanh Ha interviewed Efraim Halevy, a former head of the Mossad (1998-2002).

Departing from what is widely seen as a virtual consensus among Israeli strategic analysts, Halevy maintains that though dangerous, Iran is not an existential threat to Israel.

Thanh Ha wrote: "Mr. Halevy rejects the apocalyptic language typically used to frame the prospect of Iran lobbing nuclear bombs at Israel."

Halevy is quoted as saying: "I believe Israel is indestructible… I believe it is not possible to destroy the State of Israel. Because we have a defensive capability. And because we have a variety of offensive capabilities. A variety, not just one particular capability… We are a big country now… We have a critical mass of population which ensures that we cannot be destroyed."

Mentioning one example of Israel's capability, Thanh Ha cited Israel's three new German-built submarines equipped, it's believed, with nuclear missiles. According to other sources, these submarines are likely deployed in the Mediterranean and Arabian Seas within striking distance of Iran.

Many Israelis analysts, however, point out that while such weapons may discourage normal, rational actors, it cannot be known whether Iran's current religiously fundamentalist leaders, who are determined to acquire nuclear weapons and have repeatedly threatened to destroy Israel, can in fact be deterred (as was the case, for instance, with the United States and the former Soviet Union during the Cold War).

Moreover, while Israel is indeed a very strong country, given its tiny size (slightly smaller, within the 1967 lines, than Lake Ontario), even one Iranian nuclear bomb could do immense damage.

It's refreshing to hear Halevy's confident assertion that Iran is not an existential threat to Israel. But most strategic thinkers believe Israel can't operate under this assumption.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Conservatives focus on restructuring

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Philip Scheim says he is "pretty optimistic" about the future of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ), following his return from the organization's four-day biennial convention in Cherry Hill, N.J., last week.

"Basically, this is a movement in transition," said the rabbi and spiritual leader of Toronto's Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation.

As part of Hayom: The Coalition for the Transformation of Conservative Judaism, Rabbi Scheim was a signatory to a letter written earlier this year to then-USCJ president Raymond Goldstein expressing an urgent need to discuss new strategic directions for the organization, which comprises some 700 North American congregations.

Over the course of a decade, the movement has dropped from 800 synagogues to fewer than 700. In the past year, 30 congregations have disassociated themselves from the USCJ, among them Toronto's Adath Israel Congregation, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and Beth Tzedec Congregation. The Toronto shuls cited mainly financial issues, but also philosophical ones, as reasons for leaving.

The USCJ "realizes it has to clearly be much more responsive to congregational needs and anticipating what those needs might be in the future," Rabbi Scheim said. The biennial was "in a sense, a celebration of the transition," he said.

Rabbi Steven Wernick, who became the USCJ's executive vice-president and CEO on July 1, told the 500 delegates – among them 14 Canadians – that the issue is "the proverbial 'elephant in the room.'

"In recent years we haven't been all of what we could be. We haven't been enough of what you wanted us to be."

A major change that has begun to be implemented is the consolidation of 15 regions into six districts.

Paul Kochberg, president of the USCJ's Canadian region, said the key feature of the biennial was "approval of the bylaws that put into force transformation of the organization."

Among other initiatives Rabbi Wernick mentioned, the USCJ is addressing leadership training and the issue of prayer.

"Many of our congregants report that tfillot in many of our synagogues do not speak to them, do not inspire them and do not reach their hearts or their souls." He said that the movement must confront the issue "immediately."

The USCJ is also examining ways to reinvigorate its youth groups. Kochberg, who chairs the USCJ's international youth committee, created another committee to examine what works – and what doesn't – in the organization's youth programs, including United Synagogue Youth (USY).

"Numbers are declining, and kids' interests are changing," Kochberg said, adding that the committee's work will be fast-tracked "because it's urgent."

Rabbi Scheim said a meeting of the Rabbinical Assembly's committee on laws and standards, which he's on, had to be rescheduled because it was left without a quorum when teleconferencing technology malfunctioned.

It was expected to debate a responsum that would urge Jewish cemeteries to create separate sections where non-Jewish spouses can be buried. It was also slated to debate forms of contraception, and the issue of violent video games.

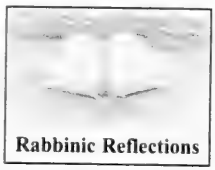
Angels: messengers of God

By RABBI DAVID CADOCH

Do angels exist, and if so, what is their nature and what do they have to do with our world?

These questions have been studied by our sages in various contexts, from a philosophical, logical and kabbalistic perspective. Each brings a different school of thought, spanning the ages of our rich rabbinic tradition.



Rabbinic Reflections

We begin by looking at the first biblical reference to the spiritual world of angels, in Bereshit (Genesis): "And God spoke: 'Let Us make man (a representative) in a form worthy of Us as is commensurate with being in Our likeness…' So God created man in a form worthy of Himself…, male and female."

According to our sages, when the Eternal created human beings, He consulted with the angels, who were created before mankind. The Talmud relates that the angels' reaction was that God should not create mankind, as that would lead to destruction. In His unlimited kindness, however, He chose to go ahead and create mankind, gifting him with the ability to earn his divine nature in the midst of an earthly life, in order to sanctify God.

In Genesis, a passage in Akedat Yitzchak (the sacrifice of Isaac) reads: "An angel of God called unto him from heaven and said: 'Abraham Abraham… Stretch not your hand towards the lad.'" There are more references to angels in Genesis, the last of which is in parshat Vayishlach, where Jacob wrestles with a man that the sages identify as an angel of God.

An angel is a messenger, a guardian and an advocate, an entity created to carry out a specific mission for a specific time. Just as there are no two people exactly alike, there are no two angels exactly alike. The nature of the angel corresponds to its mission. According to the Kabbalah, every person is accompanied by two angels at all times.

Our sages teach that when a person does an act of kindness or a mitzvah, an angel is created and acts as an advocate when this person's time comes to leave this world and stand before the Heavenly Tribunal. But if a person commits acts of dishonesty and is evil toward others, he creates an opposing angel that serves as an accuser before the Heavenly Tribunal.

There is another school of thought according to Moses Maimonides, the Rambam, in his Guide for the Perplexed. He writes that angels are incorporeal intelligences without matter, but nonetheless, created beings that adapt to different forms and are seen in prophetic visions only.

Maimonides writes that angels may appear as male or female, depending on their mission. Acts of God are performed by angels, and hence the term messenger of God as an attribute of the angels.

The sages write that angels cannot replicate themselves nor consume food as we do, although they give the impression of specific human attributes when they are assigned a mission on earth, as in parshat Vayera, when three angels are sent to Abraham with three missions: to visit him at the time of healing from the brit milah; to announce the birth of Isaac; and to carry out the destruction of Sodom and Gomorah.

Abraham receives his guests and prepares special foods for them. The Torah writes that they eat and drink, but the sages remark that since they were angels, they merely pretended to consume the food and drink.

Rabbi David Cadoch leads Shabbat services at Beth HaRambam Synagogue in Cote St. Luc, Quebec, and is the rabbi for the Maimonides-affiliated private homes.

A fresh start for the new year

In the new year, all of us want the vibrancy of health, the security of worldly goods, the inspiration of beauty and the solace of love. But the cup of life runs bitter as well as sweet. The world gives us not only the pleasant things but also cruel things. And because we know the fickleness of fate, we are afraid.

Bookmarks
Bernard Baskin

The new year poses some basic questions – "Who am I?"; "What do I stand for?" and "What does life demand of me?" They are anxiety producing because we are practical people living in a technological society. Technocrats say, "I will get you there more efficiently, but once you get there, I have nothing to say to you."

Ours is a society that is concerned with means, with instruments, not with ends. Ends petrify us. It makes us terribly uncomfortable to be asked, "What for?"

The ultimate questions of where we are, or who we are, get drowned in small talk, or in doubts, or in quarrels, or in drink. People hide the questions behind the complaint, "I am bored." People tell me that they are bored, and I observe that they have everything to live for. Nevertheless, they tell me, they are bored.

When one has to face the grey walls of a hospital or a mortuary or a divorce court, the boredom ends, the strategies of evasion crumble, and the question comes out in the form of a scream, "Where is the life I have lost while living?"

The truth is that we lack perspective. We are not prepared for disappointments. There is a story about a distraught mother who wanted to commit suicide after she had lost her child. She was told by a venerable sage that if she found a certain rare mustard seed, her child would be restored. But she found that wherever she went, she heard similar sad stories.

She never got the mustard seed, and she did not commit suicide. But she learned the lesson the sage meant to teach her, that if you take your tragedy, no matter how grave it is, and hold it up in perspective to all that is happening in the world, it becomes small and you can bear it.

If there is nothing more than you and your troubles, then there can be nothing but frustration. If there is nothing more than the immediate moment, then we are truly in a madhouse. If there is no purpose to life, then the death of a loved one is without meaning.

But is there purpose in life? Can tragedy be overcome? Can suffering be endured? Are we part of some greater and more enduring design than the few years granted us?

In her wide-ranging new book, The Case for God, Karen Armstrong asserts that the remote God of the philosophers tend to fade from peoples' minds and hearts. There is little comfort to be found in an unknowable and indefinable God.

Instead, she commends those who live generously, large-heartedly and justly, and inhabit every single part of their humanity. They honour the ineffable mystery they sense in each human being and create societies that protect and welcome the stranger, the alien, the poor and the oppressed. "Of course, they often fail, sometimes abysmally. But, overall, they find that the disciplines of religion help them to do all this," she writes.

We serve God best when we enhance the "worth whileness" of life by using His gifts, holding firm to the conviction that the world is good and that life is worth living and its possibilities are unending.

Jewish Life

A la carte religion weakens tradition

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Intermarried couples with children have long faced the "December dilemma," the question of whether to celebrate Christmas, Chanukah or both.

Immortalized by The OC's "Chrismukkah" and by jokes about Chanukah bushes, the holiday season brings to the fore the potential tensions that face multifaith families. With an intermarriage rate hovering at about 50 per cent since 1990, such conflicts aren't uncommon. But not only the statistics are new. With the demographic changes comes a seismic shift in attitudes. What was once seen as a tragedy is now just another lifestyle choice in the age of autonomy.

But the celebration of Christmas by Jews transcends the delicate blending of religious customs that may be common for Jews who marry Gentiles. The general pull of the Yuletide season – songs, movies, decorations, food and treacly materialism cleverly sold as universal brotherhood – holds enchantment for many who are not even intermarried, but feel as if they're "missing out" on something. For many Jews, Christmas envy doesn't seem to burn off along with the eight days of oil.

Witness Cindy Chupack and her husband, both Jewish. Chupack was a writer and executive producer of the TV show Sex and the City. Flipping through the Pottery Barn catalogue, she recalled, in a 2006 article in the New York Times, being hit by a wave of desire to own a Christmas tree, complete with stockings and holly. This wasn't about Christianity, mind you. It wasn't about celebrating the birth of a saviour, or the belief that God is incarnate (considered idolatrous in Judaism). It wasn't about centuries of proselytization, forced conversion and cross-stained blood, or flayed skin, empty tombs and Torquemada. Nor was it about Mother Teresa and the sheer power of faith to penetrate the darkest corners of humanity and redeem the world.

Rather, in Chupack's words, after purchasing a tree and velvet stockings and attending her first gingerbread-house decorating party, she and her husband "both love our winter wonderland. Some nights I put on our Starbucks Christmas CD, light a fire, turn on the tree and play with the different settings... and then I sit back and enjoy my first Christmas in all its kitschy splendour." Her rationale for doing all this reflects how religious particularism is now seen as the enemy of enlightenment: "It's nice to teach children that holidays can be done a la carte. Every religion, every culture has so many beautiful rituals and traditions to choose from. Maybe celebrating is a step toward tolerating."

But ordering pieces of disparate religious ritual like so many courses on a menu – contemporary samplers of Christianity and Judaism, with each new purchase "a la carte" – produces the ironic effect of weakening, and even dismantling, the traditions they claim to love.

For a moment I wondered, what would happen if we applied this mentality to other institutions in our life – say, for example, marriage. But given the staggering rate of adultery in the modern West, I quickly realized that this, too, is an idea whose time has come.

The frozen Chosen

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

Whenever Danny gets the urge to strap on his skates, he hops into his car and drives to the nearest rink – a mere four-hour trek! Danny loves hockey, but he lives half a country away from Israel's only regulation-size rink in Metulla, in the country's north. When he's not skating, the transplanted Canadian can take in the shrine he has built to hockey – an entire room festooned with hockey memorabilia – jerseys, autographed hockey cards, even bobbleheads – thousands of miles away from North American shores. [bit.ly/hoks01] Danny is one of hockey's true believers in Israel, the frozen chosen.

According to israelhockey.com, "Hockey got its start in Israel in the mid-1980s when a Haifa carpenter who had seen ice skating rinks on a visit to California decided the folks back home would love a new activity. He set out to build Israel's first skating rink, which was opened in January 1986." Thanks to Canadians, American, native Israelis and immigrants from the former Soviet Union, by 2005, Israel won the gold medal at the International Ice Hockey Federation Division II Group B. [israelicehockey.com]

This summer, Israel played host to the second World Jewish Ice Hockey Tournament. More than 200 Jewish athletes from around the world competed on behalf of teams from Canada, the United States, Russia, France and Israel. The Globe and Mail's Patrick Martin was there and was impressed. "It was an odd place to find such a high level of hockey being played – the Middle East in July – but it made the occasion that much more special." And Israel didn't fare too badly, winning the senior bronze medal. [bit.ly/hoks09]

Lest you be under the impression that hockey in Israel is an all-male affair, take a look at the promotional video for Israeli women's ice hockey. [bit.ly/hoks08]

As mentioned, all Israeli hockey fans eventually find themselves in the country's only Olympic skating rink in Metulla at the Canada Centre. The centre has put together a lovely photo gallery of budding hockey and figure skaters. [bit.ly/hoks07]

Although most Israelis don't have easy access to an ice rink, that doesn't mean they can't improve their ice skills. Using a bit of homegrown ingenuity, an Israeli software developer has created a computer program that is supposed to enable athletes to hone their perception and decision-making abilities. The company, Applied Cognitive Engineering, has been working with USA Hockey on the "Hockey IntelliGym." [bit.ly/hoks06] The company claims that it is possible to "train brain skills in the same manner that muscles are trained." It has adapted techniques used to train fighter pilots of the Israeli air force for athletes on the basketball court and hockey rink. [intelligym.com]

So far, we've seen a lot of transplanted North Americans who have retained their hockey roots when in Israel. But there actually is a league that boasts Israelis now living in Canada, who play on behalf of the old country. [bit.ly/hoks05] You can watch a clip of the Israeli Maccabees face off against the Ojibwe Northern Storm for the Canadian Multicultural Women's Championship. Without giving too much away, let's just say for the Maccabees, there's always next year. [bit.ly/hoks04]

In January, Israel will play host to the fourth annual International Israel Ice Hockey Tournament with representation from the United States, Canada and Europe. [bit.ly/hoks03] Maybe one day when Israel reaches true peace with its Middle East neighbours, its ice hockey elite will have a chance to face off against hockey teams from some other countries better known for sand than ice: Kuwait, Algeria and the United Arab Emirates. [bit.ly/hoks02]

Truth be told, hockey in Israel is not quite as prominent as soccer, basketball or tennis, and has some work to do on raising its profile. There's the story of the fan who lived on Kibbutz Ein Gedi, not far from the Dead Sea. He was waiting for a bus holding his hockey stick, but a passerby thought he was tending his flock holding a shepherd's crook.

Quebec cuts funding to three Orthodox colleges

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A post-secondary institution founded 25 years ago to provide job training for chassidic Jews is fighting to stay open after the Quebec government announced that because of the school's religious character, it will no longer receive funding. It is currently being funded through a public institution.

TAV (the Torah and Vocational Institute of Montreal), which essentially operates as a private institution, has received provincial money through the public Marie-Victorin CEGEP (MVC), throughout its history.

On Dec. 4, Education Minister Michelle Courchesne told Radio-Canada, "We cannot accept that a CEGEP supported by public funds goes so far as to accept restrictions related to religion. What is not acceptable is that elements of a religious character are introduced into the curriculum."

Her decision also affects two other Orthodox Jewish educational institutions that have agreements with MVC: Bais Chaya Mushka Seminary and Beth Jacob Seminary, which offer teacher training and other courses to women.

TAV is not permitted to accept any new students, and a plan is being worked out to allow its current 550 students to finish their courses, said academic co-ordinator Eli Meroz. Public funding will end next year.

Meroz said the ministry has been asking questions about TAV in recent weeks, but the news stunned him.

He said he hopes to enter into talks with the education ministry to have TAV reclassified as a private college. Such institutions are eligible for funding of up to 60 per cent of what public CEGEPs receive, which is approximately what TAV has been getting via CMV.

Although Jewish studies were an integral part of the curriculum when TAV was founded, Meroz said religion is not taught in any course today. TAV has changed in other ways over the years, he added. Women and men are no longer necessarily in separate classes, although they usually sit separately within the classroom, and the teachers are not all Jewish.

While the majority are Orthodox, students now come from different segments of the Jewish community, he said. TAV does close for Jewish holidays, but classes are made up at other times.

Meroz said TAV accepts only Jews in compliance with earlier education ministry directives.

The school currently offers courses in early childhood and special needs education, office systems and accounting, and personal fitness.

Meroz said.

TAV founder and director Abraham Boyarsky, a Concordia University mathematics professor, blasted the decision as "pandering" to certain elements in the Quebec media and society determined to eliminate any vestige of religion in the educational system.

He insists that nothing in the arrangement with MVC contravenes the education act.

Mtl. Federation reviews role

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL —After three decades of decline, the Montreal Jewry is "stable," say Federation CJA leaders, who believe the community is no longer aging and is retaining and even attracting young people.

Having reached this state of equilibrium, the federation thinks it's a good time to take the pulse of the community and examine its role in it.

The federation has begun a process that it calls "strategic revisioning," which entails reviewing its operations and goals, and planning for how to better serve the community in the future.

Immediate past president Marc Gold, who is heading the project, said the federation recognizes that it has to be open to change in order to be relevant to Montreal Jews, especially the younger generation and those not involved with the organized community.

"This an exercise to better understand what the community wants and how it sees its future and what role we can play," he said. "We want to listen to what people have to say, and the federation board and executive committed to act on what we learn."

He heads a steering committee made up of people with different backgrounds and ages.

Now is an ideal point to undertake such a process, he added, because the federation has a new executive director who has experience in taking stock of Jewish communities in transition.

Argentine-born Andres Spokoiny, who assumed the post this past summer, worked for the previous 12 years with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, based in Paris, with responsibility for the revival of Jewish communities in the Baltic states and Poland.

The process has been launched by sounding out focus groups composed of representatives from its agencies and other community groups. Early in 2010, this inquiry will expand to try to reach all segments of the community through one-on-one interviews, town hall meetings and a formal survey, conducted by independent consultants. The federation is looking for innovative ideas.

Cotler organizes petition on Iran's genocidal incitement

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Liberal MP and human rights activist Irwin Cotler is calling on the international community to collaborate and combat the genocidal ambitions of "Ahmadinejad's Iran" through an international petition he presented last week in Ottawa.

Irwin Cotler

Titled "The Danger of a Nuclear, Genocidal and Rights-Violating Iran: The Responsibility to Prevent Petition," the 85-page document, according to Cotler, lists measures that the United Nations, as well as state parties to the Genocide Convention, the European Union, the International Court of Justice and others, can legally undertake to prevent President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's Iran from committing mass genocide and to hold the country to account.

"This is the most comprehensive, complete and current compilation of witness testimony and documentary evidence that has ever been gathered," he told The CJN.

"It makes it clearer than any other petition or document before, that Iran is in standing violation of international legal prohibitions against the development and proliferation of nuclear weapons… [and] that Iran has already committed the crime of incitement to genocide."

The measures in the petition include remedies through domestic and international law, as well as a range of economic and investment sanctions and other initiatives.

Cotler characterized Iran as showing a "toxic convergence" of three threats: nuclear ambition, incitement to genocide and "massive" domestic human rights violations.

Cotler timed the petition's announcement to coincide with the 61st anniversary of the Genocide Convention and with the eve of the anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The 60 signatories who had endorsed the petition as of last week included prominent jurists, politicians, and human rights figures, such as former UN Human Rights high commissioner Louise Arbour; Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel; former UN mission commander for Rwanda, Senator Roméo Dallaire; Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz; former prime minister John Turner; former Swedish deputy prime minister and genocide expert Per Ahlmark, and several Iranian human rights scholars.

The litany of Iran's transgressions cited in the petition – the "precursors to genocide" is exhaustive, including demonization of Israel, Holocaust denial, anti-Semitism, genocide incitement, nuclear threat, systematic and widespread killings and torture, assaults on women's rights, and murder of political dissidents.

The petition also delineates a "12-point framework for remedy and redress" to counter the Iranian threat. It includes 12 "generic sets of remedies" that countries can follow, as well as "threat-specific remedies" for states and institutions to use.

As the petition specifies, states such as Canada could file an "inter-state complaint" before the UN Security Council for sanctions and account, Cotler said.

"This has been done for the nuclear issue, but it also has to be done for the genocide issue," Cotler said.

He noted that the genocide issue will not reach the International Criminal Court unless the UN Security Council refers it there.

The petition also recommends that other nations try to pass legislation similar to Cotler's own private member's bill, the Iran Accountability Act.

Cotler said the next step would be for signatories to the petition to advocate for measures in their own countries. Cotler expected to seek Israeli support this week during a trip there and said there would be a campaign in 12 countries, including the permanent members of the UN Security Council the United States, France, Britain, Russia and China – as well as Germany, to have the petition supported and implemented.

Husband urged to grant get

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish men in Montreal who refuse to give their ex-wives a get, a religious divorce, have been put on notice that they could be exposed to public naming and shaming.

The Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get and several rabbis are supporting the effort by Rachelle Hecht to make it known that her former husband, Eric Seltzer, has not granted her a get, even though they were divorced civilly three years ago.

A rally that was to have taken place outside Seltzer's place of work, a restaurant on Sources Boulevard in Dollard des Ormeaux, was cancelled Dec. 9 due to last week's snowstorm, but apparently it would not have been able to go ahead anyway because the municipality denied the group a permit.

Evelyn Brook, president of the coalition, which was founded by major Jewish women's organizations in Canada, said some sort of future public action is planned.

The rally had the support of rabbis Chaim Steinmetz, Reuben Poupko, Mordecai Zeitz and Michael Whitman, all leaders of modern Orthodox synagogues. The action also included notifying media and an announcement on Facebook, the social-networking website.

This is only the second time in Montreal that the rabbinate has endorsed a public demonstration drawing attention to a recalcitrant ex-spouse. Three years ago, the Rabbinical Council of Montreal organized a rally outside the home of another man who had not given his wife a get for seven years.

Rabbi Steinmetz, of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem, said this method of communal pressure is used quite often in the United States and has been effective.

Rabbi Steinmetz, who is the rabbi of the Hecht family, said such action is used only when lengthy private persuasion has failed.

Shiff lived 'North American dream'

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

In the Jewish community, Joseph Richard Shiff was known as a philanthropist, businessman and teacher

But to his grandchildren, he was just Zaide.

"Zaide was funny," Rachel Shiff, one of his 20 grandchildren, said at his funeral, held at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. "He was mischievous… Zaide loved to laugh with us."

Shiff, who was 83, died on Dec. 1 after suffering from liver problems and prostate cancer.

The businessman helped create the position of the J. Richard Shiff Chair in Canadian Jewish Studies at York University and two similar positions at the University of Toronto.

Apart from being a former president and chair of Bramalea Ltd., a real estate company, Shiff lectured at various universities and was a former lawyer, as well as a past vice-president of Associated Hebrew Schools.

Joseph Richard Shiff

During his eulogy, Rabbi Chaim Strauchler of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation described Shiff's story as "the North American dream."

"[He is a] dreamer, and one who understands dreams," the rabbi said, explaining that, when Shiff immigrated to Canada from Poland at age six, his family had very little.

"The family entered Canada on the lowest economic rung," Rabbi Strauchler said. "But they came to this country with an asset to be cherished above all others – a love of learning and a passion to achieve."

As a teenager, Shiff – called Dick by his friends– was no stranger to hard work.

He worked as a waiter, at carnivals, in the fur business and as a teacher.

"Dick's poor roots drove him to succeed. He was always working, running, striving," the rabbi said, adding that, by his late 20s, Shiff became a partner in a law firm.

"He dreamed of what might be… he dreamed of years of plenty and years of famine," Rabbi Strauchler said. "And he prepared, he worked, he thought and he created."

In the business world, Shiff was a success, but his grandchildren will remember him as a man who made funny faces at the dinner table and still wrote love letters to his wife, Dorothy.

For Rachel, family gatherings were always memorable.

"Zaide was the happiest when his family was all together. It was never calm. It was always noisy," she said. "Zaide loved his family…[He] loved every single person who was connected to us – our friends, our boyfriends, our dogs."

Randy Shiff, one of Shiff's five children, remembered his father as an intellectual, a leader and a storyteller.

"When we were young, he would lie with us in our beds and tell us stories of his fictional friend, Chief of Police MacKenzie. He would jump from bed to bed and read books to us until late in the night," he said.

"He encouraged all his sons to do their best. He was in many ways an academic and led by example… It is hard – no, it is impossible – to say goodbye."

Shiff is survived by his wife, Dorothy; his sons and daughters-in law Randy and Donna, Barry and Aleta, Danny and Elaine, Ari and Carla, and Lisa; and 20 grandchildren. He was predeceased by his son, Laurie.

CJN columnist addresses panel

Last year, CUPW passed a resolution that supported a boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel and released a statement that called Israel an apartheid state.

Lemelin recommended to the CPCCA panel that "the report from these hearings make it clear that criticism of Israel is not anti-Semitism… [and] that the Canadian government be urged to actively persuade Israel to stop the building of settlements, end the occupation, support the right of return, and treat all of its citizens in an equal manner."

During Troy's testimony, he said that while it is not anti-Semitic to criticize Israel or to question Zionism, it is "not just criticism of Israel – but reeks of anti-Semitism – when the criticism is so disproportionate, continuing the West's historic obsession with the Jew."

Troy, a CJN columnist, added that criticism of Israel crosses the line into anti-Semitism "when Israel is demonized with traditional anti-Jewish tropes, really tics, exaggerating the Jewish lobby's power, making the Jewish state the one pariah nation, transforming the old big lie of 'Christ killer' into the new big lie of apartheid or Nazi-style racism."

Gil Troy

He said that those who are merely critics of Israel should "denounce the ugly anti-Jewish caricatures in the Arab press, the rank anti-Semitism polluting Islamism, the Hamas charter, much Palestinian media, and so many anti-Israel protests.

"If anti-Israel protesters stood up to Jew hatred, saying, 'No, take down that sign, don't publish that cartoon, change your charter,' we would not need parliamentary inquiries like this."

Wittes, the daughter of a Holocaust survivor, said that her work with the Canadian Centre for Diversity has taught her that education is the key to making social change.

"Until all of us are having honest conversations about what anti-Semitism looks like – traditional anti-Semitism, the new anti-Semitism – and how it impacts individuals in our community, we are just talking to the wall," Wittes said.

"We need to bring other people in to hear the story of anti-Semitism, to understand the rich history of the Jewish people, certainly to understand the Holocaust, but also perhaps recognize that anti-Semitism and the Holocaust do not solely define Judaism or the Jewish experience and Jewish culture.

"In order to be able to move forward and be embraced in a full way by Canadians on every level, we need to open up and share who we are apart from just that negative piece."

The CPCCA originally scheduled eight hearings, but earlier this month, three more hearings were added to invite Canadian police force representatives to make recommendations about better defining and tracking anti-Semitic incidents, and to give university presidents – who were unable to attend the Nov. 24 hearing about anti-Semitism on Canadian campuses due to scheduling conflicts – an opportunity to testify.

The CPCCA, formed in March, brings together 22 Canadian parliamentarians whose aim is to confront anti-Semitism in Canada today. It was inspired by the inaugural conference of the Inter-parliamentary Committee for Combating Anti-semitism held in London, England, last February.

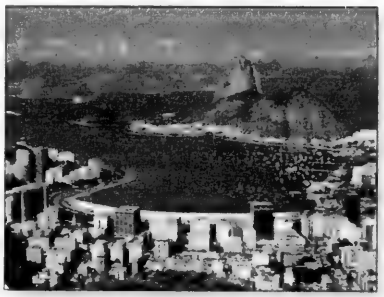
Students to volunteer in Brazil

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Hillel of Greater Toronto and Hillel Rio De Janeiro are teaming up, for the first time, to give Canadian students the opportunity to visit and volunteer in the Brazilian Jewish community.

During reading week, Feb. 14 to 21, 2010, Laura Herman, Hillel of Greater Toronto's engagement co-ordinator at the University of Toronto, plans to lead 12 to 15 students to Brazil. She hopes they will learn about the under-served populations in Latin America and practise the values of tikkun olam.



"We hope and do expect that when they come back from the trip, they will be involved in advocacy or fundraising or different opportunities that the students can create here relating to the issues that we learn about in Rio," Herman said.

Out of about 175 million Brazilians, the Jewish community makes up about 120,000, with the majority residing in Sao Paulo, Rio De Janeiro and Porto Alegre.

Most of Brazil's Jews are secular and are considered to be part of the upper middle-class of Brazilian society. The Jewish community is focused on preserving and enhancing its Jewish identity, and one of the main concerns is the rate of intermarriage, which hovers around 60 per cent.

The Brazilian Jewish community boasts about 80 organizations that are affiliated with the Federação Israelita do Estado do Rio de Janeiro (Jewish Federation of the State of Rio de Janeiro – FIERJ). The organizations include about 30 synagogues, five Jewish schools and Zionist women's organizations, as well as sport and cultural associations.

Herman said Hillel Rio is different from Hillel's in North America in that it operates more as a community organization, rather than a group strictly for students. It provides Jewish youth of all denominations with a place to congregate and establish a connection to their Jewish heritage; provides programs, including Hebrew classes and lectures about Israeli history and culture, and promotes travel opportunities through Taglit-Birthright Israel and MASA – The Project for Long Term Programs in Israel.

Herman said that Hillel Rio invites students involved with Hillels all over the world to participate in weeklong tours that include volunteer opportunities, meeting members of the Brazilian Jewish community and sightseeing.

The cost of the program, which is $900, includes accommodation in Lagoa (near the beach), transportation to and from all activities and most meals. The cost of the flight is extra, but Herman said a grant from Hillel International will provide a $200 subsidy to offset some of the cost of the flight.

Hillel Rio provides a tentative itinerary that includes volunteer opportunities with organizations such as Project Smile, which gives underprivileged children the opportunity to learn about oral hygiene; Child in Motion, a program that invites volunteers to visit a local community centre and teach values through games and music, and Project Sababa, a program that involves volunteers visiting a Jewish seniors home and interacting with the residents.

Other cultural activities students can expect to participate in include a Capoeira workshop, where students learn about this Brazilian mix of martial arts, dance and music; a Caipirinha workshop, where students learn how make the most famous Brazilian drink, and a Samba dance class.

"We'll be spending Shabbat with the Jewish community in Rio, so because of that, we'll gain an even greater understanding of the way the Jewish community works there, the history there. And we're going to visit the Jewish museum," Herman said.

"All those kinds of things will really be a great opportunity for our students, so they not only understand the external culture in Rio, but they can also understand what makes that Jewish community unique and how we can work with them in the future."

But, Herman said, the itinerary provided by Hillel Rio isn't set in stone.

"When we go in February, it happens to be during the week of Carnaval [an annual festival], so we said we're interested in participating as a group in one of the Carnaval events," Herman said.

"If we know that [students] are interested in volunteering in a specific place, we would help to facilitate that as well."

She added that she'll be accepting applications until the beginning of January, and she said she's looking for students who are interested in social justice work and helping communities aside from their own.

"They should have a keen interest in actually bringing what they're going to be learning back to the community," Herman said.

"In an increasing global environment, the Jewish youth is really connected to the broader community… In order to reach out to people who have multiple identities, this is a great way for them to take an interest in impoverished youth and for them to incorporate that with Jewish values."

Iran testing key nuclear bomb component

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

LONDON — Iran is set to test a key component of a potential nuclear weapon, the Times of London reported Monday, citing secret intelligence documents related to Tehran's controversial nuclear program.

According to the documents cited in the report, which foreign intelligence agencies date to early 2007, Tehran had planned to test a neutron initiator, the component that triggers the explosion in a nuclear weapon.

The document revealed in the Times of London report described the use of a neutron source, uranium deuteride, which experts said could not possibly be used for anything but the development of a nuclear weapon.

Experts also told the British newspaper that uranium deuteride is the material used in Pakistan's nuclear bomb, from which Iran obtained its blueprint.

Benjamin Netanyahu

"Although Iran might claim that this work is for civil purposes, there is no civil application," David Albright, president of the Institute for Science and International Security in Washington, told the Times of London, adding that the document is "a very strong indicator of weapons work."

According to Monday's report, a top source at the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) confirmed that the evidence had been passed to the UN's nuclear watchdog.

Responding to the Times' findings, an Israeli government spokesperson said Israel is "increasingly concerned about the state of the Iranian nuclear program and the real intentions that may lie behind it."

Publication of the nuclear documents will increase pressure to have tougher UN sanctions against Iran, which are due to be discussed this week. But the latest leaks in a long series of allegations against Iran will also be seized on by hawks in Israel and the United States, who support a pre-emptive strike against Iranian nuclear facilities before the country can build its first warhead.

Mark Fitzpatrick, senior fellow for non-proliferation at the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London, told the Times that the "most shattering conclusion is that, if this was an effort that began in 2007, it could be a casus belli [a justification for starting a war]. If Iran is working on weapons, it means there is no diplomatic solution."

"Is this the smoking gun? That's the question people should be asking. It looks like the smoking gun. This is smoking uranium," Fitzpatrick added.

Taiwan said on Monday it would investigate reports that local firms had sold nuclear technology to Iran, which the West suspects aims to build bombs.

Its economic ministry's import and export administration pledged to conduct the investigation partly as a result of a report in the London Daily Telegraph that said Iran had set up a nuclear equipment smuggling network using Taiwan companies, administration director Chen Ching-chih said.

Other intelligence also pointed to a Taiwan-Iran link, he said.

Iran obtained 100 transducers, tools that convert pressure into electrical signals, that were made in Europe and sold to a company in Taiwan, the Telegraph said, citing western intelligence officials. It said Taiwan in turn sold them to Iran.

"This is going to take some time. It's a thorough investigation and very detailed," Chen said. "We need to know, after all, which, if any, domestic firms are involved."

Taiwan firms are not known globally for their nuclear technology, Chen said, and none had a permit to sell to Iran.

The Taiwan Defence Ministry, which can authorize military-related trade deals, said last week it had heard of no such transactions.

A government probe in March following intelligence from overseas cleared a Taiwan company reported to be working with a foreign partner to offer nuclear technology to Iran, Chen said.

Iran needs up to 15 nuclear plants to generate electricity, its foreign minister said on Saturday, underlining Tehran's determination to press ahead with a program the West suspects is aimed at making bombs.

On Saturday, Israeli officials said the UN Security Council could launch a fourth round of deliberations on sanctions against Iran as early as January.

The United States, Great Britain, Germany and France will likely file a first draft with the council next month, Israeli foreign policy officials and European and American diplomats told Ha'aretz.

Israeli officials' intensive talks with their Russian counterparts have led them to believe that Russian President Dmitry Medvedev is more willing than ever before to have additional sanctions against the Islamic Republic.

Israeli and European authorities believe Russia's support virtually guarantees that new sanctions may be put in place. A senior Israeli official said that "if Russia moves toward sanctions, the Chinese won't want to be left standing alone and will have no other choice but to join as well."

Nonetheless, Israel is interested in drafting an alternative plan in case the Security Council debates do not progress.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said in closed-door meetings that an effective sanctions package can be assembled through U.S.-European Union co-operation, bolstered with assistance from regional powers like Japan and South Korea.

Meanwhile, Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said Saturday that his government is willing to adopt the UN recommendation and exchange most of its stock of enriched uranium for nuclear fuel rods to power what it calls its research reactor, but only in keeping with its own timetable.

"We suggested that in the first phase, we give you 400 kilograms of 3.5-per cent enriched uranium and you give us the equivalent in 20 per cent uranium," the Associated Press quoted Mottaki as telling reporters at a regional security conference in Bahrain.

Mottaki said Iran would follow its own timetable and "mechanism," and suggested that the exchanges of uranium for fuel take place on Iran's Kish Island in the Persian Gulf.

Rabbinate revisits conversion annulments

By CNAAN LIPHSHIZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — An Israeli non-profit group that assists Jewish converts is for the first time planning to take the Chief Rabbinate of Israel to court for not preventing the retroactive annulment of conversions, Ha'aretz has learned.

The organization's founder says that "back room" talks convinced him such outside pressure would give rabbinical leaders the impetus to address the issue on its own.

"We've co-operated with the rabbinate for years, building a dialogue and trust with them, but the situation cannot be allowed to go on," said Rabbi Seth Farber, the U.S.-born founder of the Jerusalem-based assistance organization ITIM, which is preparing a petition to the High Court of Justice against the rabbinate.

Numerous Jews over the past years whose conversions had already been approved by the rabbinate, have encountered officials – primarily municipal rabbis and rabbinical judges – denying their religious status, Rabbi Farber asserts. In the petition's draft, he asks the court to order the rabbinate to ensure that all of its employees and representatives fulfil their duties, namely recognizing all Jews with rabbinate-approved conversions as such.

Sources inside the rabbinate said the outside interference called for by the petition could be "harmful" and said they would "address internally and possibly change" the treatment of converts as early as next week.

Rabbi Seth Farber

Rabbi Farber, a modern Orthodox rabbi who moved to Israel in 1995 from New York and founded ITIM in 2002, said he would go ahead with the petition unless "the current reality changes." "I will do so with a heavy heart, but if we don't stop this now, the ramifications could be far worse."

ITIM has a staff of 11 people and assists people in dealing with Israel's religious institutions.

The decision to litigate came after Rabbi Farber "saw that the rabbinate would just not confront the rabbis and rabbinical judges who refuse to recognize converts," he said, explaining that when ITIM complains to the chief rabbinate, the chief rabbinate refers ITIM "right back to the rabbi in question – to work it out with him."

This week, Farber sent a letter to Israel's respective Sephardi and Ashkenazi chief rabbis, Shlomo Amar and Yona Metzger, detailing the basis for the planned petition. In the letter, he recounts recent cases where officials retroactively nullified conversions or refused to process marriage requests for converts.

In the letter – which Rabbi Farber calls a "last plea for action" to avert litigation – he asks what the rabbinate intends to do regarding the actions of Rishon Lezion's chief rabbi, Yehuda David Wolpe, who last summer ruled that four converted couples could not be wed because they weren't really Jewish. So far, the rabbinate hasn't answered his letter.

Hod Hasharon's chief Ashkenazi rabbi, Reuven Hiller, speaks of "a rift within the chief rabbinate" between haredi ideologues and "National-Orthodox pragmatists" who seek to facilitate the integration of Israel's 300,000 non-Jewish Russian-speaking immigrants into its Jewish population.

Rabbi Hiller says he doesn't support getting the High Court of Justice involved, because he believes it has "no jurisdiction over halachic issues" and is therefore legally futile at best and antagonistic at worst.

Still, he says the petition could be "an effective tactical move that will give the rabbinate's leadership an excuse to clean the stables and lay down the law."

Such a solution, however, would be short-lived, he says, because "there is a strong radical contingent that will eventually find ways of making its presence in the rabbinate felt."

Rabbi Hiller says the "strategic solution" is to bypass the "radical contingent" with Tzohar, a non-profit group comprising hundreds of volunteer rabbis working to "bridge the gap between religious and secular Jews," as the organization's mission statement says.

"Over the past year, we have set up a network of municipal rabbis who are sympathetic to our cause and can be trusted to fairly process all applicants - converts or not," said Rabbi David Stav, Tzohar's chairman and Shoham's chief rabbi. "In so doing, we hope to insulate converts from rabbis who aim to obstruct their path."

Rabbi Stav and other key figures in the field don't expect conversion-nullifying rabbis to be punished, an idea raised in a recent Knesset discussion. A senior adviser to Sephardi Chief Rabbi Amar said: "If the rabbis who nullify conversions thought for one minute they might get fired for it, then they would not be nullifying conversions."

Rabbi Amar's adviser also said that "there are other internal means and devices to pressure radical rabbis who for political reasons decided they needed to show their communities that they are 'more Catholic than the Pope' by reversing conversions sanctioned by Rabbi Amar and Rabbi Metzger."

The adviser said some of the rabbis in question – including Rabbi Wolpe of Rishon Lezion and Ashkelon's chief rabbi, Yosef Haim Bloi – were to be be called in Monday to explain their decisions to the Supreme Rabbinical Council, presided by the two chief rabbis of Israel and more than a dozen city rabbis. "This meeting could change that which needs changing," said the adviser.

U.K. appoints first Jewish ambassador to Israel

JTA

LONDON — The British government has for the first time appointed a Jewish diplomat to be its ambassador to Israel.

Matthew Gould's appointment was announced last week. He's set to take up his post in the second half of 2010.

Gould, 38, is considered one of the Foreign Office's high-flying diplomats, currently serving as the Principal Private Secretary to Foreign Secretary David Miliband. He has already started taking Hebrew-language lessons as part of his preparation for the new job, though he has some advantage on that front, since he is familiar with the language.

During his 16 years at the Foreign Office, Gould had two postings to Muslim countries, the most recent as deputy head of mission in Tehran. He told the Jewish Chronicle that during his time there, he "made a point of going to shul in Tehran. It was both a means of expressing support to Jews there and putting down a marker to the Iranian government that there was a watching brief on how it treated its minorities."

Israel is not foreign to Gould, who has visited the country many times in the past. He also has some relatives in Israel.

Sweden warns: Don't divide EU

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Swedish Foreign Minister Carl Bildt warned that Israel must not play "divide and rule" with the 27-member European Union over a recent resolution calling for Jerusalem to become the shared capital of Israel and a future Palestinian state.

Bildt, whose country holds the EU's rotating presidency, said last Thursday the bloc was united and would not "remain shy" on so crucial an issue.

The EU's adoption of the new resolution on Jerusalem sparked an angry reaction from Israel, which captured the eastern half of the city in the 1967 Six Day War.

Israel Foreign Ministry said the statement by the European Union on the status of Jerusalem was substantially softer than Sweden's initial draft, once again demonstrating the Scandinavian country's failure as the EU's rotating president.

EU foreign ministers called for negotiations over Jerusalem, saying a way should be found to make it the capital of two nations, Israel and a future Palestinian state.

"Sweden has done nothing over recent months to advance the Middle East peace process," a Foreign Ministry official said. "The EU's only saving grace is that some of its members are responsible and moderate nations that didn't support the Swedish draft, which looked like something taken out of the Fatah platform at the Bethlehem conference."

Sweden last month presented a draft document supporting the division of Jerusalem and the recognition of east Jerusalem as the capital of a future Palestinian state.

"The peace process in the Middle East is not like IKEA furniture," a Foreign Ministry official said, referring to the Swedish furniture chain. "It takes more than a screw and a hammer. It takes a true understanding of the constraints and sensitivities of both sides, and in that Sweden failed miserably."

A senior ministry official added that a group of nations had "saved the European Union from itself, since any other decision would have dealt severe harm to the relations between Jerusalem and Brussels, and would have prevented the EU from becoming an important partner in the peace process."

Earlier, the Foreign Ministry issued an official response to the EU statement, saying that the "European Union ignores the primary obstacle to achieving a resolution between Israel and the Palestinians: the Palestinian refusal to return to the negotiating table."

Hasmoneans ruled Negev

The rule of the Hasmonean dynasty extended south to the Negev, new archaeological excavations have found. "The Hasmonean king Alexander Jannaeus, great-grandson of Matityahu, conquered Gaza and the Negev and for decades prevented the Nabateans from using the Incense Road," said Tali Erickson-Gini of the Israel Antiquities Authority in a statement last week. The Nabateans were an ancient Semitic people from southern Jordan, Canaan and the northern part of Arabia. "We are talking about a revolutionary discovery that will redraw the maps of the region which describe that era and greatly increase the territory governed by the Hasmoneans into the heart of the Negev Highlands as we know it," said Erickson-Gini, scientific editor of the excavation at Horvat Ma'agurah, near Sde Boker in the south. "This is an important discovery from an archaeological and historical standpoint."

Referendum needed on pullout

An amendment approved by the Knesset will advance a bill requiring a referendum on Israeli territorial withdrawal as part of any future peace deals. The 68-22 vote that passed the amendment came two days after Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced Syria was ready to restart peace talks without first requiring Israeli agreement to a full Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights. The referendum bill has passed its first reading in Knesset. An Israeli law requires a referendum on any territory under Israeli control, including the Golan, but it requires that the Knesset pass legislation mandating how the referendum would be handled.

Fayyad rejects unilateralism

In a meeting with Jewish Council for Public Affairs leaders, the Palestinian Authority prime minister said he opposed a Palestinian unilateral declaration of statehood. Salam Fayyad told a group of 15 JCPA leaders visiting Israel last week that he does support Palestinians unilaterally building infrastructure and political institutions in preparation for future statehood, and compared those efforts to the work of the founders of Israel before its statehood in 1948.

Vandals sack W. Bank mosque

Vandals sacked a West Bank mosque and left settler graffiti on its walls. The vandals raided the mosque before dawn Dec. 11, burning furniture, prayer rugs and holy texts and defacing the mosque's walls, Ha'aretz reported. One graffiti read "Price tag – greetings from Effi." Effi is a Hebrew name and "price tag" apparently refers to the slogan extremists have adopted to describe their pledge to extract a "price" in attacks on Palestinians for settlement freezes. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government has just launched a 10-month settlement freeze to accommodate the Obama administrations attempts to revive peace talks. Ehud Barak, the defense minister, slammed the attack. "This is an extremist act geared toward harming the government's efforts to advance the political process for the sake of Israel's future," Ha'aretz quoted him as saying. The army is investigating.

Schalit release not imminent

Senior Hamas officials said last Friday that a prisoner swap deal for the release of abducted Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Schalit was unlikely to be completed in the near future. The officials told the Al-Hayyat daily that Israel was still refusing its demands regarding 100 of the 450 prisoners set for release. Media have recently reported that there has been progress in the talks to free Schalit, more than three years after he was abducted by Palestinian militants in a cross-border raid from the Gaza Strip.

Danish Jews ponder bleak future

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

COPENHAGEN— Forty years ago, when a few thousand Polish Jewish refugees arrived in Denmark fleeing an anti-Semitic campaign orchestrated by Poland's Communist government, Danish Jews welcomed the newcomers with high hopes.

Previous waves of Jewish immigrants had rejuvenated a community marked by high rates of intermarriage, assimilation and emigration, and Denmark's Jews held out the same hopes for these new immigrants.

But many of the Polish Jews were assimilated and saw little value in Jewish affiliation, and even those who joined the active Jewish community have seen their children – following the example of generations of Danish Jews before them – intermarry and drift from Jewish life in Denmark.

"Our children, even some of them who went to Jewish school, most of them are getting assimilated," said Jacob Zylber, who arrived in Denmark four decades ago at age 23. "You cannot do much about it."

Sergio Della Pergola

Today, Denmark's Jewish community of some 2,000 members is scarcely bigger than it was 40 years ago. With no great wave of Jewish immigrants on the horizon, Jewish leaders fear they may be witnessing the death throes of a community that dates back to the 17th century.

"It will be a very, very small community, and probably a more cultural, social, friendship club," said Bent Lexner, the country's chief rabbi, when asked what he foresees for Danish Jewry. "You never know what's going on tomorrow. But as I see it now, there will be very few people who are identifying themselves as traditional Jews."

Denmark's Jewish leaders are trying to figure out how to sustain a community whose active young Jews decamp for better social and religious opportunities abroad and whose least committed melt into a society that has been, by European standards, remarkably welcoming of its Jewish minority.

"The answer is to try to hold on to the members that we can hold on to, and try to get a lot of the potential members to join, which is very hard to do," said Finn Schwarz, the president of Mosaiske Troessamfund, the community's main umbrella group.

Schwarz recently took the unprecedented step of sending letters to 500 former community members urging them to return. Besides touting all the typical community offerings – the Jewish school, old-age home, the synagogue – he also noted the importance of fighting for Jewish rights, a point that these days has a particular potency in a country with a growing and restive Muslim minority.

Schwarz says he prefers to view the future of Danish Jewry with optimism. Other community leaders, however, are more accepting of the community's declining numbers.

Rabbi Lexner, chief rabbi since 1996, caused a minor stir when a Danish newspaper quoted him as saying, in effect, that there was no law requiring Denmark to have a Jewish community. Rabbi Lexner's three children all live in Israel.

"I'm happy to see them there," he said. "I can see that my education has succeeded."

The plight of Denmark's Jews raises questions about the fate of scores of smaller European Jewish communities, many with distinguished histories that go back centuries. Though even stable Jewish communities in the United States face similar challenges of intermarriage and assimilation, the lack of a critical mass of members contributes to a self-reinforcing cycle: each Jewish emigrant raises the incentive for others eager for a vibrant Jewish life to follow suit.

"That's the fate of small communities," said Sergio Della Pergola, one of the world's foremost Jewish demographers and himself a European emigrant. Born in Italy, Della Pergola now lives in Israel.

"[Community life] is not feasible below a certain threshhold," Della Pergola said. "And this is something that strangely enough people do not realize."

About the only person who doesn't fear for the community's future is an outsider: Andrew Buckser, a professor of anthropology at Indiana's Purdue University and the author of perhaps the most comprehensive academic study of Danish Jews, After the Rescue.

Buckser says Denmark's Jews have worried about their community's disappearance for a century, yet the community is still around. While he acknowledges the demographic challenges posed by emigration and assimilation, Buckser's notion of what constitutes a Jewish community in the modern age leaves him confident that the predictions of Danish Jewry's demise are overstated.

In After the Rescue, Buckser argues that Danish Jewry is not a community in the classical sense – a clearly defined group marked by a common set of beliefs and practices. Rather, Judaism in Denmark is more of a "toolbox," a set of symbols from which individuals draw at will to construct their own identities. And that toolbox, he says, is as vital as ever.

The fear of communal demise in Denmark is "based on an assumption that assimilation and intermarriage will result in your community disappearing," Buckser said in an interview. "I'm not sure that's a correct assumption."

Though Buckser may be right, most Danish Jews aren't thinking about Jewish symbolism when they ponder the fate of their community. They are thinking about their institutions – the synagogues and schools and nursing homes that they fear will no longer have a constituency to support them.

"I'm not an optimist," said Arne Melchior, a seventh-generation Dane whose father and brother both served as chief rabbis.

Films present the family history

By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

In the 1960s, Canadians were captivated by the graceful athleticism of Canadian skating champion Petra Burka. Coached by her mother, Ellen, Petra conquered world figure skating in 1965 (our first world champion since Barbara Ann Scott in 1947) and won the bronze medal in the '64 Olympics.

Famous for her record-breaking triple salchow, Petra now consults for Skate Canada, discovering young talent.

Petra's success was but the tip of the iceberg in the Burka family story. A 2008 documentary, Skate to Survive, written and directed by Petra's sister, Astra, tells the extraordinary story of their mother, Ellen Danby Burka, who survived Nazism to create a new life for herself and her girls in Canada.

The film, Astra's third, focuses on Ellen's dynamic personality while shedding light on her history. A champion skater and choreographer in her native Holland, Ellen kept important truths about her past from her daughters until they were in their teens.

When it was suggested that Astra make a film about her mother, she seized the opportunity. "I pored over all the pictures and wanted to do something with them creatively. I wanted to tell stories about my family's past from found objects. It has been a very wonderful journey, and I am happy that these stories are being seen," Astra said.

Ellen's story is beautifully told. Archival footage is balanced with scenes from the present, as Ellen tells her story in comfortable surroundings, joined by her childhood friend Elsbeth. We witness this close friendship between two Dutch girls, one Jewish and one Christian, both besotted with skating. Elsbeth tells us that the day the Nazis came for Ellen and her family, she too was threatened with arrest. Elsbeth's father kept Ellen's family's keepsakes safe during the war.

Ellen lost her parents and grandmother in the Holocaust, but her older sister survived by going underground. Ellen met artist Jan Burka, whose drawings appear in the film, at Theresienstadt. After the war, the couple married and immigrated to Canada. When they settled in Toronto, Ellen saw pervasive anti-Semitism and "restricted" private clubs, and decided to keep her past a secret. After the couple divorced, she worked hard as a coach and raised her girls alone.

"My sister Petra and I always felt there were family secrets," Astra says. "When my mother told me [her story] at 16 years, I was old enough to understand what had happened. It was strange to be raised in Canada with no mention of relatives or any family history. My mother said my grandparents died in a car accident. When you're young, you accept and don't question."

The documentary is a multi-faceted gem of esthetics, character, and politics. Now an octogenarian, Ellen is still coaching young skaters – in addition to Petra, Toller Cranston is another famous pupil who uses the dance moves that she pioneered in the figure skating world.

She speaks honestly about the dangerous years under the Nazis that were followed by a tough emotional and financial adjustment to Toronto, yet these experiences neither limit nor define her.

"Most people are inspired by Ellen's energy," Astra says, "and realize that one can succeed in life if one is determined to do so. Her typical saying is, 'If there's a will there's a way.'"

After Skate to Survive, Astra realized that she had another story to tell.

When she was in Israel in 2008 to present Skate to Survive at a Film Festival in Ashkelon, she was invited to Yad Vashem for a private screening.

"As I entered the display of Theresienstadt, I saw a huge blow-up of one of my father's drawings... and started crying. It really upset me. After leaving the memorial, I went to the art gallery exhibit of paintings done by artists during the Holocaust. The first display I looked at was a display of artists' tools used to make drawings during the war. I read the label – they belonged to my father."

Moved by the experience, Astra made another film, Painting Daddy, which, focuses on the paintings Jan Burka created at Theresienstadt and how this experience influenced his life as an artist. The Burka family history now seems complete.

Astra Burka's short film, Painting Daddy, is scheduled to air on TV this spring. Skate to Survive is available for sale at www.ruthfilms.com.

Update on Yichud (Seclusion): As reported in last week's Eye On Arts, the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company pulled Yichud (Seclusion) from its 2010 season after a major sponsor withdrew its financial support. The play, by Julie Tepperman, was to be a co-production with Theatre Passe Muraille, which gallantly decided to stand by the play despite the loss of $50,000 in financial backing.

In only a few weeks, Theatre Passe Muraille (TPM) has raised most of the necessary funds, thanks to the generosity of a "variety of angels," according to TPM artistic director Andy McKim. Last week, TPM was still attempting to raise the last portion of funds to pay for the first week of rehearsal. Even so, it was clear that in the best show-business tradition, the show would go on as part of TPM's 2010 season.

The production is to be directed by Aaron Willis with a cast consisting of Diane Flacks, Richard Greenblatt, Jordan Pettle, Michael Rubenfeld, Julie Tepperman and Aaron Willis, plus a live klezmer band. The play previews from Feb. 6 and runs Feb. 10 to 27 at Theatre Passe Muraille, 16 Ryerson Ave. For tickets, visit artsboxoffice.ca or phone 416-504-7529.

Correction

The article "German auctioneer drops sale of claimed Stern art" (CJN, Dec. 3) contained an incorrect statement based on information received by The CJN. A German auction house did refuse to withdraw Stern art on at least two occasions in the past, but this was the first time the auction house Lempertz has been asked to withdraw a work.

ESTHER GELBER FUND

The Esther Gelber Fund was created by sisters Nance Gelber, Patty Rubin, Judith Gelber and Sara Charney in honour of their late mother, Esther Gelber, a well-known Toronto arts supporter and philanthropist. The fund provides performers with the opportunity to commission a composer of their choice for a debut performance. Wave, a chamber symphony for soprano, violin, cello and piano by composer Gary Kulesha, was commissioned by the Gryphon Trio, the first performance through the fund. Pictured at the premier of Wave at the Jane Mallett Theatre last month are, from left, Patty Rubin, pianist Jamie Parker, Nance Gelber, cellist Roman Borys, violinist Annalee Patipatanakoon, and Judith Gelber.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Historical towns, art and natural beauty in southwest France

By WOLF ARNOLD
Special to The CJN

AGEN, France — In the land spreading across the regions of Aquitaine and Midi-Pyrenees in the southwest of France, the countryside, with its valleys and wide vistas, is lovely when the trees are about to change colour and the air is still mild enough for you to sit at an outdoor café.

Here, you are in the land of the medieval troubadours, of Henry II, Eleanor of Aquitaine and Richard the Lionheart. In their times, these areas of France were contested by the English, defended by the French and ravaged by battles and hit-and-run warfare during the Hundred Years War.

An hour south of Agen, a market town on the Garonne River famous for its plums, fortified villages and towns abound. Called bastides, they were founded by the English and the French in the 13th century to encourage a stable population in the contested areas before the Hundred Years War. They are out-of-the-way places, yet still worth a detour.

A typical bastide is Vianne, a few kilometres from the town of Nérac. It's an English bastide, founded in 1284. Set beside the river Baïse, it is a prime example of a fortified town.

Nearby is the bastide of Barbaste, a little town where the French king Henri IV, when he came here to hunt, would bed down for the night in the fortified mill that stands on the Baïse.

Henri was a popular monarch and instrumental in the construction of the Pont Neuf, the place des Vosges and the place Dauphine in Paris. He was raised a Protestant, but while his mother remained loyal to the Huguenot cause, Henri, to bring peace to his kingdom, became a Catholic. Making his way to Paris, he supposedly coined the expression: "Paris is worth a mass."

The mill with its towers and arrow slits still looks formidable, but today, it is a quiet spot where the river is spanned by a picturesque bridge.

On the opposite bank, lies Lavardac, a French bastide from 1268, built as a rival to Vianne, although hardly any traces of the medieval town remain today. More bastides can be found north of the river Garonne, one of them the former bastide of Villeneuve-sur-Lot. Rather than spending a lot of time in this town where the 13th-century bridge offers the only interesting view, drive up to the nearby hilltop village of Pujol-Haute, from which you can enjoy a view of the town and countryside spread out beneath you.

If you want to visit a Romanesque abbey, the place to go is Moirax, a short drive south of Agen where, on a steep hill, a 12th-century Cluniac abbey dominates the fortified village. With its clean lines and the warmth of its stones, the church has a simple grandeur. And especially when the afternoon sun bathes the ancient stones, you can't escape the feeling that here is a place worthy of admiration. Despite the silence today, the courtyard of the abbey between the church and the monks' dormitory will take you back to a time when this abbey was humming with life in the medieval world of worship and work.

A trip to Armagnac country

A more famous abbey that should not be missed stands at Moissac east of Agen, an hour's drive on the N113. The abbey was founded near the end of the seventh century and enjoyed the patronage of Charlemagne. Moissac was also on the pilgrimage route to Santiago de Compostela. Pilgrims prayed and assembled here before embarking on their dangerous journey through hostile territories to Spain, although it is believed that pilgrims enjoyed a sort of diplomatic immunity.

The works of art that adorn the south portal of the church and the capitals of the cloister are masterworks of 12th-century sculptors and master masons. Seventy-four stone carvings, some religious, other secular, adorn the capitals (the usually heavily decorated cap or crown of a column). Outstanding are also the figures on the tympanum above the south portal. Though they are of the Cluniac style, some appear rather curious, as if the chief sculptor, as art historian Lord Clark remarked in his book Civilisation, must have been "a sort of Romanesque El Greco of the first order."

This land is also Armagnac country. Armagnac is the noble cousin of Cognac, which hails from the region of the river Charente, some 160 kilometres to the north. Both Armagnac and Cognac are brandies and derive from the distilling of ordinary white wine. While Cognac ages in barrels of white Limousin oak, Armagnac matures in local "black," sappy oak, a process that makes it age much more quickly. Because it is also distilled at lower strengths than Cognac, Armagnac delivers a stronger, more fiery quality. The lower the strength of this process, the more flavouring elements remain.

Cognac has been around for some 300 years after merchants from the British Isles discovered that inferior white wine can be distilled, and thus Cognac was born. The names that are now synonymous with the top brands of Cognac such as Hennessy, Martell and Hines attest to this heritage. Armagnac, on the other hand, was not appreciated until early in the 20th century, because most of it was sold to the distillers in the Charente. Much is said about the individual attributes and distinctions of the two, and neither seems to come out a clear winner, but it is generally believed that the best of well-aged Cognacs carries the day.

Going gentle into that good night

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

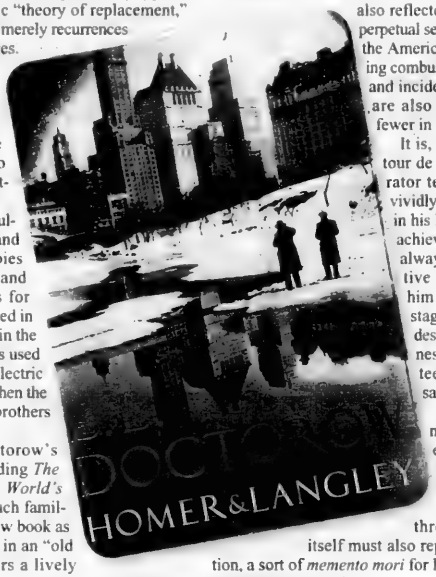
The Collyer brothers, Homer and Langley, were the stuff of urban legend. A couple of eccentrics, they lived in a grand Fifth Avenue brownstone left to them by their parents who died when the boys were young adults. Langley, wounded by mustard gas in the Word War I, became a classic hoarder of junk from the streets of Manhattan and increasingly misanthropic with the years. Homer had lost his sight but knew his way around the clutter-filled halls, corridors and stairways of the family manse.

Suspicious of authority and fearful of intruders, the brothers grew increasingly reclusive as they grew older. They boarded up the windows and stopped paying their taxes and utility bills. The real-life brothers died within days of each other in 1947: Langley first, then Homer some days later because he had relied upon his brother for sustenance and was helpless without him. Notified of a foul odour, the authorities broke down the door and found Homer's body. Only after removing tons of junk from the house, a labour that took more than week, did they stumble upon Langley's corpse just 10 feet away.

Onto this historic foundation, American writer E.L. Doctorow has built a strange novelistic edifice, Homer & Langley, that seems to be crumbling at the cornices just like the declining mansion in which its eponymous central characters reside like inmates in an asylum.

It is, in the early years, a place where music and laughter resound and weekly tea-dances are held as a public service. In Doctorow's reworking of the Collyer legend – ably narrated by the blind Homer – the brothers have servants, romantic affairs and social interests beyond their homestead, and they outlive their real-life counterparts by about half a century, enduring through the hippie era into at least the 1990s.

Langley's lifelong project is to compile a universal newspaper containing a distillation of all news that ever happened: he keeps files of newspaper stories, categorized by type of event. According to his eccentric "theory of replacement," all occurrences and all people are merely recurrences of previous events and personages. Yet he cannot find an equivalent for certain events such as the Jonestown mass suicide or for certain people such as the brothers themselves, whom he regards as "sui generis." They go into his file of unique items awaiting a repetition.



Langley fills the house with multiple sets of daily newspapers and the detritus of his various hobbies and enthusiasms: old bicycles and typewriters and assorted parts for same, medical specimens preserved in alcohol, a Model-T Ford parked in the main hall – the motor of which is used to generate electricity after the electric company turns off the power. (When the city disconnects the water, the brothers haul water from a nearby park.)

Readers familiar with Doctorow's other acclaimed novels – including The Book of Daniel, Billy Bathgate, World's Fair and Ragtime – will find much familiar "Doctorow" detritus in the new book as well. Like beloved items found in an "old curiosity shop," one encounters a lively speakeasy, jazz music and musicians, an old-fashioned police raid, Chicago-style gangsters, and a lovely Japanese-American couple whose position as loyal servants to the Collyers cannot prevent their internment after Pearl Harbor.

Doctorow's reverence for New York and its history is also reflected in these pages, as is his perpetual sense of disillusionment with the American dream. Those astonishing combustible moments of character and incident for which he is famous are also present, although much fewer in number.

It is, of course, something of a tour de force to have a blind narrator tell a tale so credibly and vividly. That he is also going deaf in his later years only adds to the achievement. But Doctorow has always been a master of narrative voice. What is newer for him is the focus on that lateral stage of life that Shakespeare described as "second childishness and mere oblivion, sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything."

The Collyer mansion was not just a home to the brothers but "a road on which Langley and I were travelling like pilgrims," Homer notes about midway through his tale. The novel itself must also represent a spiritual meditation, a sort of memento mori for Doctorow himself as he approaches the age of 80.

Its central conflict seems to be the brothers' attempt to integrate into the world around them, and their ultimate failure as they withdraw ever more fully and permanently into the home that eventually becomes their tomb. What begins as a Dickensian frolic ends up more like a gothic nightmare from Poe. This is a story of decline and decomposition, of the loss of the light, of two brothers sinking so deeply into the morass of their own eccentricity that they are transformed into mythic figures, the stuff of legend.

Homer & Langley is 208 pages long and is published in hardcover by Random House.

The Humbling by Philip Roth

For some years now, in novels like The Dying Animal (2001) and Everyman (2006), Roth has been obsessed with the declining potency of the aging human male, leading critics to speculate that aging novelists who are themselves in decline are fashioning a whole new genre of geriatric lit.

Roth's latest offering is The Humbling, which features a 65-year-old protagonist named Simon Axler, a stage actor who now does more fretting than strutting as he mourns his diminished abilities, on stage and off. Axler, we are told in the first paragraph of the novel, has "lost his magic. The impulse was spent. He'd never failed in the theatre, everything he had done had been strong and successful, and then the terrible thing happened: he couldn't act. Going onstage became agony. Instead of the certainty that he was going to be wonderful, he knew he was going to fail."

Axler retreats from the spotlight of the stage only to step into the spotlight of literature. The script then calls for a spell in a psychiatric institution, a serious consideration of suicide, and a series of women in whose hand mirrors the hapless Axler hopes to find some still-intact reflection of himself.

It is humbling for a man to grow old and lose his powers – novelists included. Rare is the writer who prefers to light a candle instead of mourning the loss of the light. Happy Chanukah, everybody.

The Humbling is 140 pages long and is published in Canada by Hamish Hamilton, a division of Penguin.

Rabbinical student makes cross-cultural music

By VICKY TOBIANAH
Special to The CJN

Noam Katz's latest album, A Drum in Hand, blends traditional prayers with hand drumming and rhythms from around the world.

Katz, 31, played his songs in front of 3,500 people at the URJ Biennial, a conference for Reform Jews held in Toronto last month, hoping his music would "foster community and bridge gaps between both Jewish and other interfaith communities."

Due to complete his rabbinical program at the Hebrew Union College in Los Angeles in May, Katz hopes to help the Jewish community develop connections with other areas of the Diaspora through social justice and the arts.

As a young child, Katz attended Jewish summer camps where he was immediately struck by the power of song leaders.

"It was transformative to watch song leaders get up in front of hundreds of people for beautiful services or a raucous song session," said Katz, who plans to move to Toronto with his wife and daughter.

He said he saw how music is able to make Jewish prayer services more meaningful.

"It was on a hilltop or in the forest, instead of in a sanctuary, and that made Judaism come alive for me. I knew that's what I wanted to be doing."

Growing up listening to Bob Dylan and Joni Mitchell, as well as other folk musicians, Katz quickly learned that music was something he wanted to contribute to, not just listen to.

His first album, Rakia, released in 2001, was a folk rock album of new Shabbat and Havdalah melodies. At that time, he was part of the Freedom Music Project, headed by a Jewish folksinger, Peri Smilow, whose goal was to bring Jewish and African voices together to form a gospel choir that would sing new renditions of songs from the Passover seder and songs from the civil rights movement.

"Once I was exposed to this cross-cultural musical experience, it made me hungry to start looking elsewhere for partnerships and musical influence."

Katz later met J.J. Keki, the leader of the Abayudaya Jewish community in Uganda.

The Abayudaya Jewish community observes Jewish laws and traditions as they were observed in the early 1900s.

Initially, the Jewish community had more than 3,000 members, but the numbers dwindled to the 600-member community it is today.

"They have to continue to pass the Jewish torch or else it won't be continued," Katz said.

They live as traditional Jews, keeping the mitzvot of kashrut and Shabbat, celebrating holidays and conducting morning prayers.

"I was just blown away by the authenticity and diversity of their Jewish music. They had their own melodies, harmonies, blending Hebrew liturgy and East African rhythms together."

After quickly forming a friendship with Keki, Katz said he "immediately felt a personal sense of obligation, knowing I had the skills as an English and Judaic teacher, as well as a musician, to contribute to their community."

With the help of the American Jewish World Services and with Kulanu, organizations that assist dispersed Jewish communities around the world, he travelled to Uganda to spend time living among the Abayudaya Jewish community.

He learned that they suffer from the common maladies facing any community in the underdeveloped world, such as poverty and malaria, but they still observe Judaism.

"It was a very different experience. For a few months, I lived in a simple room, without electricity or running water. I slept under a mosquito net and I had to learn to deal with a different, diet – their meals consist of plain rice with some vegetables and very little sources of protein," Katz recalled.

"I had to physically and culturally adapt, but the fact that we shared Judaism, a vision about education and a love of music helped me feel as much at home as I could in East Africa."

Katz helped create a Jewish youth group for the Abayudaya community, which was the first of its kind in Uganda.

"One day, we rented a taxi, stuffed 20 people in it and drove to the Sipi Falls, one of the most beautiful places in Uganda. Many of them had never been [there] even though they lived in Uganda their entire lives, because it cost the equivalent of $1.25 to get there," Katz said.

Katz's second album, Mirembe, is a tribute to the Abayudaya community and the way it has helped shape his music.

"They helped me make my music more worldly, and they had shown me never to take my Judaism for granted. My music has more of a social justice theme now that had not been there before."

Katz wrote a new melody to a traditional Jewish prayer, Am Yisrael Chai, which was inspired by the Abayudaya community.

The Abayudaya speak Luganda, a local language in which a vowel sound is often placed at the end of words. They have adopted this speech pattern in their distinct pronunciation of the Hebrew language.

By taking Hebrew words and mixing them with the Luganda pronunciation, the song reflects the blend of the two cultures and two languages joining together to form one universal message: that the strength of God and the Jewish community will live on forever.

Another song, Mirembe, Salaam, V'shalom, is a tribute to the different faith groups who Katz sees as "exemplars of peace and coexistence."

Katz's newest album, A Drum in Hand, bridges different rhythms and influences from around the world. With a mix of Afro-pop, Spanish melodies, Middle Eastern instruments and genres rooted in Katz's own American rock 'n' roll background, he hopes the diverse album can transcend barriers and make his audiences feel like part of a global community.

Noam Katz, centre, said he was "blown away by the authenticity and diversity" of the music of the Abayudaya Jewish community.

Als' head coach Trestman savours victory

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Maybe having a Jewish head coach such as Marc Trestman has helped the Montreal Alouettes – after all, it was coach Marv Levy who helped make the Als two-time Grey Cup champions in the 1970s.

Speaking last week, Trestman couldn't have sounded more relaxed or content, savouring what could only be described as one of the most miraculous and sweetest Grey Cup comebacks of all time after the Als squeaked by the Saskatchewan Roughriders 28-27 Nov. 29 in Calgary with zero seconds to spare on the clock.

"I feel great about it," Trestman said in a telephone interview from his home in Raleigh, N.C. "I feel very happy for our players, coaches… everybody's worked very hard.

"We played hard throughout the season, had a little bit of luck at the end, and it worked out for us."

A little bit of luck?

The Als were 16 points down – 27-11 – with only 11 minutes to play. They hadn't led during the whole game, despite being huge 9-1/2-point favourites before kickoff, after going 15 and 3 in the regular season and crushing the B.C. Lions 56-18 the week before to earn a trip to the big game.

Then, thanks to a touchdown drive and pass led by quarterback Anthony Calvillo, and another TD by running back Avon Cobourne, the Als were within two points – but kicker Davon Duval missed a 43-yard field goal attempt for the win.

Then, a miracle happened.

The Riders had a 13th man on the field for the kick – linebacker Sean Lucas – and with no time left on the clock, Duval got one more kick at the can, so to speak, and 10 fewer yards to cover in the second attempt after the Riders were assessed a penalty.

Sweet victory. The Als earned their first cup win since 2002.

Trestman agreed that the "too many men on the field" call was a "gift from heaven," even though his team came within striking distance on their own.

"Like I said afterwards, we had Lady Luck on our side," Trestman said. "Lady Luck, the hand of God, whatever you want to say – the universe was aligned the way it needed to be aligned to have another chance."

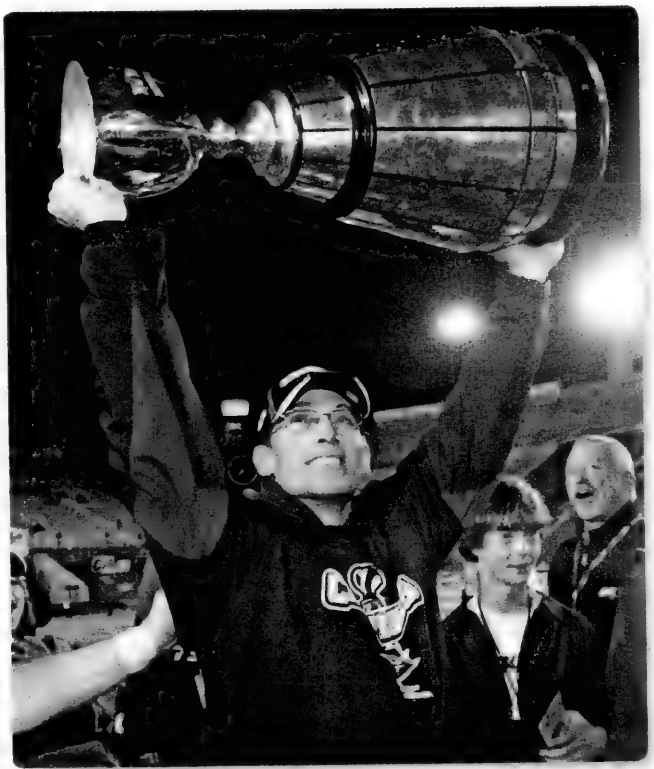
Indeed, it seemed a deserving way for Trestman to mark his two years with the Als.

"I've said it from the beginning: I fell into a very good situation [with the Alouettes] – a very good owner, president, general manager, and a group of players that was basically in place."

Did he go through the proverbial roller-coaster of emotions during the big game?

"No, you don't really go through any," Trestman replied. "You're just busy working. There was a moment there that [the thought] flickered in my head: 'What am I going to say to these guys if we don't get this done?'

"But it only lasted a billionth of a second. Then you just go back to work and try to do your job."



Montreal Alouettes head coach Marc Trestman hoists the Grey Cup after his team beat the Saskatchewan Roughriders.

Trestman, who spent 17 years with the National Football League in various coaching capacities – but not as a head coach – said he loves the Canadian game, but doesn't prefer it to the American brand. "It's still football, and it's still coaching and teaching players, and I don't find it any different."

He does, however, greatly admire the Canadian Football League and its high calibre of teams.

"There's really no difference between the first team in the league and the last. It's a close and very talented league. But if you don't play well for 60 minutes, you're gonna get beat. We've shown that can happen as well."

Trestman's plans are to rest and, in January, to begin to get focused for the upcoming season by communicating with players and meeting with staff at his home in Raleigh.

"Then I'll come back up at the end of May and get started again."

Hamilton opens new day school

By HOLLY GINSLER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Hamilton's Jewish community launched a new community-wide middle school this fall with two Judaic streams – one traditional and text-based, and the other geared to demonstrating the importance of Judaism in the modern world.

The Hamilton Jewish Middle School (HJMS), which has been up and running since September, is a joint initiative of the city's two Jewish day schools – the 116-student Hamilton Hebrew Academy, a co-educational Orthodox school with students in junior kindergarten to Grade 8, and the smaller, egalitarian Kehila Jewish Community Day School, which has 34 students from preschool to Grade 5 and is housed in Temple Anshe Sholom.

The new middle school is located in the Hamilton Hebrew Academy building and uses its administration and infrastructure.

Hamilton Hebrew Academy's middle school has been folded into the new HJMS, which now consists of grades 6 and 7, and will add a Grade 8 next year.

Danna Horwood, a co-chair of the HJMS development committee, said that because the Kehila Jewish Community Day School ends in Grade 5, her children would have had to attend either a private or a public school for grades 6, 7 and 8.

Her goal was to "create a school that had a stream of education that wasn't just Orthodox-based, that would have two streams."

The new school has 12 students in Grade 6 this year, as well as 14 in Grade 7.

The process to form the school began this past summer. Horwood said the two schools were able to develop a new curriculum after they received a grant from the Avi Chai Foundation in the United States.

The director of Jewish studies at HJMS is Faiji Itkin, who helped to create the school's curriculum.

The HJMS refers to its two streams of Jewish education as "cultural" and "source-based," respectively.

The cultural stream stresses a modern look at meaningful Jewish living. Its emphasis is on the contemporary and personal relevancy of Jewish customs and ideas. Students will study present-day life in Israel, as well as how biblical and talmudic ideals apply to everyday living, HJMS' school literature says.

The source-based stream – the Orthodox track, which is similar to the curriculum at the Hamilton Hebrew Academy's old middle school – will emphasize developing the textual skills needed to read, interpret and analyze classic Jewish texts.

The adviser who's been brought in to help develop the program is Rabbi Charles Grysman of Toronto, whose doctorate focused on multi-streamed Jewish education.

The students spend most of their day studying the Ontario provincial curriculum together. "When the two streams come into play, that is when the students separate," Horwood said.

The teachers bring the two streams together to share their learning experiences. Horwood and Rebecca Shapiro, the other co-chair of the HJMS development committee, have worked with the two school administrations to plan tours and special programs for current and prospective students and their parents, and they hope Grade 5 students at the Kehila school will be encouraged to attend HJMS next year.

POTATO-PARSNIP LATKES

2 1/2 sticks unsalted butter
2 russet potatoes peeled
2 parsnips peeled
2 tblsp fresh chives
2 lg egg whites
1 tsp salt
pinch of black pepper
sour cream or applesauce

Grate potatoes and parsnips into large bowl. Stir in egg whites, chives, salt, and pepper. In large nonstick pan over low heat, heat 1/2 of butter until hot but not smoking. Drop 1/4 c portions of potato mixture into pan and flatten with spatula to form 3 1/2" pancakes. Fry until golden-brown, turning once, about 5 min per side. Drain on paper towels and keep warm in oven. Add more butter as necessary and cook remaining pancakes in same manner. Serve pancakes warm with sour cream or applesauce.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

About Life

Dear Ella,

Seven years ago today, I became a widow after 32 years of a wonderful marriage. I was so lost without my husband. He was truly my soulmate. Almost immediately, my friends tried to pair me up with different men. Not only was I not interested, I was totally repulsed by the idea.

Now, seven years later, I believe I'm ready to start thinking about possibly meeting new men. I'm not saying I'm ready for a relationship, but I am tired of being the "single" in a couples world. Even when I travel, I have to pay a hefty singles supplement to get the same things my husband and I were able to get with no added penalties.

I'm going through all kinds of mixed emotions, and I'm not sure I'm ready, but I'm also not sure it's healthy to stay isolated from any chance of having a relationship with another man. Thoughts?

Will I Ever Be Ready?
Dear Will I Ever Be Ready?

There is no right or wrong time for a decision such as this. Seven years has given you the time you need to be able to handle day-to-day routines in life. You carry with you a lifetime of wonderful memories, but it's time to move forward. There are no guarantees that dating again will fill the void in your life, but it will at least put you on a different path and change your focus. There's no need to search for romance right off the bat. Just get your feet wet. You've been used to being half of a couple. You have now had the time to become a whole person in your own right. You're not looking to replace the man you loved for 32 years, but you are right to want to open yourself up to the possibility of new experiences and a meaningful relationship.

You don't need to have high expectations, or a time frame. Take one meeting, one conversation, one cup of coffee at a time and see where things lead and how you feel. Although well-meaning family and friends may try to persuade or push you, heed your own instincts and do what feels right for you. It's OK to step outside your comfort zone. It takes bravery and confidence to jump into the unknown. You have thought this through and are taking small, deliberate steps toward a big decision. Remember, without risk there is no reward.

How to attract the 'right' people

Life Coach Corner

By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

We all know what we would love ideally to manifest into our lives. Yet often we choose the wrong people and less than perfect situations for our ultimate happiness.

So how do we attract the right people into our lives and also choose situations that will bring us closer to joy, magic, wonder, love and feeling good? I was so excited when I came across Dr. Lillian Glass' latest book, Attracting Terrific People: How to Find and Keep the People Who Bring Your Life Joy. I knew her years ago, when I used to produce a national television talk show, and she was often a thoughtful and lively guest on the program.

In her newest book, Glass talks about the difference between toxic people and attracting the "right" people to you. "Just as there are toxic people you have met through your life for whom you did not particularly care, who had traits and characteristics that drove you up the wall, or brought out the worst in you, there are terrific people who bring out the best in you."

So how do you determine what is terrific for you? Glass gives some great suggestions. She asks that you list five men and five women you have admired and respected from childhood to the present. She goes on to suggest you think about why you like or love these people, and beside each name, asks that you list some of their most positive characteristics. She adds, "Now compare your list of traits and see how many positive traits each of the people whom you respect and admire have in common. You will be intrigued, as I was to see how many positive traits are shared by these particular people on your list."

Glass describes 20 traits and types of terrific people in the book and gives a detailed description of each. See if you recognize any of the terrific people in your life (yourself included, of course!) on this list:

They are: The Feel Gooders; the You, You and You Anti-Narcissists; the Generous Givers; the Non-Judgers; the Good Mouthers; the Self-Respecters; the Class Acts; the Honest Abes; the Lightened-Ups; the Cheerleaders; the Completely Conscious; the Keep-On-Goers; the Emotionators; the Win-Winners; the Loyalists; the Immediate Doers; the Calculated Risk-Takers; the Non-Victims; the Life Livers and the Enlisters.

People that fall into any of these categories are what she calls "positive mood contagions." People on this list just help to put you into a good mood.

I touched on it earlier, but don't forget to talk nicely to one of the most terrific people you know – you!

Says Glass, "When you make statements like, 'I'm so fat,' or 'I'm too dumb' or 'I'm a jerk,' other people will unusually follow suit, because they think you know yourself better than anyone else does. If you think you are fat, then you probably are. Learn to say sweet and loving things to yourself. For example, when you drop a glass of water, or spill something on the floor, don't call yourself names or say it was dumb, stupid or clumsy. Instead be kinder to yourself and say, 'That's okay, sweetheart' or 'don't worry, honey.'"

It may seem funny to do this, but it actually works. I often thing of Kara DiGiardio, the newest judge on American Idol, and how she sweetens her comments and criticism to the contestants by saying, "sweetie, darling, sweetheart, honey, doll," maybe next time. When you say I can't do this, or this will never work, the universe responds in kind and gives that kind of reaction.

So put out positive energy and positive intentions and go to the wishing well that's full of water in your life, not the wells that are dry or that deplete you of your love and energy. Also notice the terrific people in your life. Sometimes they are right under your nose, and you just don't see who they are.

France touts stronger Iran sanctions

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — French Foreign Minister Bernard Kouchner said on Monday that the international community has no choice but to impose new sanctions on Iran for its refusal to cooperate on its nuclear program.

Kouchner said Russia is already on board with the need for sanctions, and he believes the Chinese will follow suit.

"I think there is no other solution," Kouchner told journalists. "The exact nature of the sanctions is still under discussion," he said, but added that they would be specific.

"The wealthy will be hit," Kouchner said, implying that measures to restrict access to funds outside Iran were under consideration. He also said sanctions would be difficult to put in place.

The United States has given Iran an informal deadline of the end of the year to demonstrate that it is seriously willing to discuss its nuclear program. The UN Security Council is not expected to discuss the issue of possible sanctions until January.

French Foreign Minister Bernard Kouchner

Kouchner also expressed continued support for the Iranian opposition movement.

"I believe deeply in the importance of this movement," he said, adding that the "opposition had been urging the international community to do more to support its efforts."

Also on Monday, the top U.S. military officer said military force must remain an option, although it would have only limited effect in stopping Iran from developing nuclear weapons.

"Tehran shows no signs of backing down in the standoff over what the United States and other countries say is its drive for a nuclear bomb," Adm. Mike Mullen, head of the U.S. joint chiefs of staff, told his staff in an annual assessment of the nation's risks and priorities.

"My belief remains that political means are the best tools to attain regional security and that military force will have limited results," Mullen wrote. "However, should the president call for military options, we must have them ready."

The same day, Republican Senator John McCain voiced support for applying economic pressure on Irawwn before considering military action. "Sanctions have to be tried before we explore the last option," he said on ABC television.

But McCain, the top Republican on the Senate's armed services committee, wondered whether other countries, including Israel, have the patience to see if sanctions will work.

A Day at the Kotel

People of all ages, backgrounds and affiliations find a place at the Kotel. Last week, a 13-year-old boy, right, from Kibbutz Beit Alfa in central Israel, celebrated his bar mitzvah. The same day, a group of women from the Conservative movement celebrated Rosh Chodesh under an arrangement made by Women of the Wall with the religious authorities at the Kotel. Last month, a woman was arrested for wearing a prayer shawl while worshipping there. [Flash90 photos]

Kudos For Cotler

JERUSALEM — Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin presented Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler, the international chair of the Inter-Parliamentary Coalition for Combating Antisemitism, with an award Dec. 16 for "outstanding service in the fight against anti-Semitism." It was presented in a Knesset ceremony in conjunction with the Global Forum for Combating Antisemitism, attended by some 500 international delegates, including a sizable Canadian delegation of parliamentarians and NGO members. The previous day, the former justice minister received the prestigious Menachem Begin Prize at the Menachem Begin Heritage Center in Jerusalem for leadership in international law and human rights.

Chanukah At Mosque

CALGARY — Muslim and Jewish families met Dec. 13 at a Calgary mosque to celebrate Chanukah in what one organizer said may have been the first time the Festival of Lights has been celebrated in a Muslim house of worship. The families met at the Green Dome Islamic School and Mosque to talk about their beliefs and traditions. "We live in a multicultural society and we have to know each other, we have to understand each other," Imam Syed Soharwardy of the Islamic Supreme Council of Canada told CTV.ca, who said the event was probably the first celebration of Chanukah at a mosque.

"There's more things that are similar than are different in various faiths, and it's very important for people to get together and learn about each other and talk to one another and understand what those similarities are," said Judy Shapiro of the Calgary Jewish Community Council.

World

Seattle Shooter Guilty

SEATTLE — The man who shot up the Jewish Federation of Greater Seattle building in July 2006 was found guilty of murder in his second trial. A jury found Naveed Haq, 34, guilty on all eight counts against him. Haq, of Pasco, Wash., will serve life in jail. After nearly two months of testimony, the jury agreed with the prosecution that Haq knew full well what he was doing when he wounded six women, killing one, at the federation building in 2006. Haq has a bipolar disorder and his defence claimed he didn't understand his actions.

Rabbi Attacked

VIENNA — A Chabad rabbi was attacked after presiding over a public chanukiyah lighting in Vienna. The assailant who punched Rabbi Dov Gruzman and bit off part of his finger after the lighting Dec. 12 in Stephansplatz Square was reportedly Muslim. Gruzman, principal of the Lauder Chabad High School in Vienna, had part of his finger amputated, Chabad.org reported. More than 1,000 people attended the event. Security was subsequently increased at public menorah lightings in the city.

Moldovan Regret

CHISINAU — Moldova expressed "deep regret" over the tearing down of a public menorah in its capital on Dec. 13. Moldova's U.S. ambassador made the statement in a letter to the NCSJ, an advocacy group for Jews in the former Soviet Union. Some 200 fundamentalist Orthodox Christians took down the chanukiyah in downtown Chisinau that was installed by the Jewish community and planted a wooden cross in its place. Neither police nor onlookers intervened. News footage showed a bearded priest leading the group in chanting anti-Semitic slogans.

Boy Buried Apart

MADRID —A 13-year-old boy was buried in a special section of Madrid's Jewish cemetery because he had a Conservative conversion. Gai Ben-David died earlier this month from brain cancer and was buried in an area of Madrid's Jewish cemetery set off by a row of trees and reserved for people whose Jewishness is in question. Israel's chief Sephardi rabbi, Shlomo Amar, ruled that since Gai had a non-Jewish mother and was converted by a Conservative rabbi that he shouldn't be buried in the main cemetery. He was asked to rule on the issue by the chief Orthodox rabbi of Madrid. The Rabbinical Assembly, the worldwide association of Conservative rabbis, said its members not only "take great offence at Rabbi Amar's incorrect and inhumane interpretation of Jewish law, we also abhor this misuse of power that has increased the suffering of a Jewish family grieving the loss of a child."

Rabbi Quits Group

NEW YORK —The head of an organization that oversees conversions to Judaism has resigned amid accusations of sexual improprieties. Rabbi Leib Tropper, head of the New York-based Eternal Jewish Family, is leaving the organization he founded five years ago. In a statement last week, he said his desire to "pursue a variety of other interests" led him to quit. Stories have surfaced of his sexual misconduct while overseeing conversions. A woman, whose name has not been released, told FailedMessiah.com that Rabbi Tropper allegedly asked for sexual favours in return for completing her conversion process. The woman claims she also arranged for sexual encounters between herself and his wife that the rabbi allegedly watched. FailedMessiah.com said the woman made unauthenticated video and audio tapes of sexual encounters with the rabbi that are now on the Internet. "These tapes appear to support her claims," FailedMessiah.com wrote.

Students Taunt Jews

PHILADELPHIA —Philadelphia-area high school students were disciplined after they taunted a basketball team with Holocaust slurs. Police, school authorities and the Anti-Defamation League are probing events at a Dec. 15 game between Upper Darby and Lower Merion high schools. The latter has many Jewish students, and as the game went on, taunts from a small group of Upper Darby fans turned anti-Semitic, such as "Warm up the ovens," and "We'll write you letters when you're in Auschwitz." School officials said the students were identified and subjected to "very serious disciplinary actions." Lower Merion won the game 51-27.

Prof Won First U.S. Nobel in Economics

Paul Samuelson

NEW YORK — Paul Samuelson, the first American Nobel laureate in economics, died. Dec. 13 at his home in Belmont, Mass., at age 94.

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology economist, who received his Nobel Prize in 1970, through his best-selling textbook Economics, exposed his students to the ideas of British economist John Maynard Keynes.

Keynesian economics promotes government intervention to stimulate economies in recession. Most industrialized countries are currently employing Keynesianism in response to the current downturn.

Samuelson also is credited with turning economics from a theory-based to an action-based discipline, using mathematics to answer questions about cause and effect.

Samuelson also consulted for U.S. presidents, members of Congress, the Federal Reserve Board, the U.S. Treasury and global leaders.

Samuelson, a native of Gary, Ind., said his family was "made up of upwardly mobile Jewish immigrants from Poland who had prospered considerably in World War I, because Gary was a brand new steel town when my family went there," the New York Times reported.

Ashkenazi women face greater cancer risk: study

Researchers urge all women be offered DNA testing

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A study of more than 2,000 Ontario Jewish women found that Ashkenazim are much more likely than the general population to possess a genetic mutation that significantly increases the risk of developing breast and ovarian cancer.

But of the 22 women in the study who were found to carry the BRCA1 or BRCA2 breast cancer gene, less than half were eligible for genetic testing based on Ontario's current screening guidelines, which prompted the study's authors to recommend that all Jewish women be offered DNA testing as a matter of course.

Dr. Kelly Metcalfe, the adjunct scientist at the Women's College Research Institute who began working on the study in 2008 with Dr. Steven Narod, said that only women with a strong family history are eligible for genetic testing under existing guidelines.

Dr. Kelly Metcalfe

"In the past, we would only find mutations in families where there was a strong family history, but this study showed us that we picked up a lot of mutations in women without a strong family history," Metcalfe said.

"That could have been because there were no relatives available to have developed cancer because of family members that [died] during [the Holocaust], or it could have been because it had come from the father's side and there were no women on that side of the family to have developed cancer."

Another concern outlined in the study that was published on Dec. 14 in the Journal of Clinical Oncology, was the fact that 10 of the 22 women in the study who were found to carry a mutation in the BRCA1 or BRCA2 genes did have a strong family history of cancer, but none of them were referred by their health-care provider for screening.

The purpose of the study – which the Women's College Hospital Foundation extended to allow up to 5,000 more Jewish women to have the genetic screening – is to provide high-risk women with preventative care and screening that they might not otherwise have access to based on the current screening process.

The study concluded that women who possess a mutated gene have up to a 40 per cent chance of developing ovarian cancer and up to a 70 per cent chance of developing breast cancer.

Metcalfe said that about 1 in 45 Jewish women will have a mutation, compared to 1 in 250 women in the general population.

According to the study, there is an equal risk of inheriting the gene from the maternal or paternal side, but many women and their physicians underestimate the significance of a family history of breast cancer on the father's side.

The study referred to a recent survey that showed that only 29 per cent of 628 physicians surveyed knew that genetic susceptibility to breast cancer could be passed through the father.

Of the 22 families with a BRCA mutation, 14 mutations were transmitted paternally, six were transmitted maternally, and for two women the mutation source could not be determined.

Benjamin's Lifecycle Financial Services

Through the generations ...a sacred trust

Together, we can keep the HST away from your bottom line.

When the Harmonized Sales Tax (HST) is introduced in the new year, funeral expenses will be taxed for the first time in provincial history. Overnight, the cost of a funeral will jump by 8% resulting in an additional $800-$1,200 in expenses.

Prearranging funerals has always made good sense. Peace of mind, the ability to plan just how you want to be remembered, and freezing the cost in today's dollars are a few of the treasured benefits. Now there's one more reason to prearrange: significant tax savings.

The HST deadline is fast approaching. By acting now, you can keep that legacy for your loved ones.

The magic of Jewish music

From the editor's desk...

Kislev is an especially musical month. In explaining and presenting Chanukah to our children as a joyous, light-filled holiday, we have taught them an entire repertoire of Chanukah songs. During our daily morning prayers, we add extra songs of Hallel. And on Shabbat of Chanukah, we tunefully recite an extra portion of the Torah.

Music is a typically Jewish way of responding during crisis, a simple answer to the mysterious complexity we call the human condition. The instinctive, immediate reflex response toward music as either an anguished or a celebratory cri de coeur is found deep within the soul of the Jewish people.

For example, it was as an expression of thanks, catharsis and relief that Miriam led the awestruck Israelites in a spontaneous eruption of song and dance after their escape from the charging Egyptian charioteers at the Red Sea.

It was as an enhancement of the power of collective worship that the Levites sang and played instruments during the Temple service.

As a passageway into the heart of our innermost emotions, music is a unique thoroughfare. It is so compellingly true, as the renowned scholar Hillel Zeitlin wrote many years ago, that "there are places that open only to music."

It is in the spirit of Zeitlin's observation regarding the transformative entry into usually closed places that I bring to our readers' attention a superb instructional book that actually opens up music – in particular, Jewish music – to the inquiring mind and the seeking soul.

What to Listen for in Jewish Music by Charles Heller (Ecanthus Press, 2006) is a textual key that unlocks the high realms of music's magic.

Heller is a rare, talented individual who combines mastery of music as a practitioner, composer and historian. He has performed with and written for some of the contemporary giants of Jewish music including Shlomo Carlebach, David Kusevitsky and Louis Danto. As the former choir director at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto and a consultant editor for the Cantors Assembly of New York he has composed or arranged countless pieces of music for performances in venues across the world.

What to Listen for in Jewish Music is written with a witty, deft touch that offers solid, footnoted research, large caches of interesting detail, musical scoring and wry humour.

"What is Jewish about Jewish music?" Heller asks. He answers the question by deriding it.

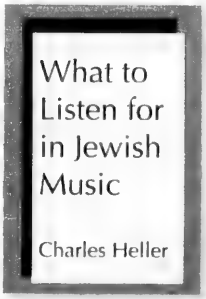
"The great musicologist Eric Werner dismissed this as 'the eternally silly question' which has no answer."

And yet, mere pages later, Heller provides an answer, though conditional, to that very same "eternally silly question."

"The answer to the question... has to be: 'Why do you want to know?' In other words, the purpose underlying the question and the nature of the person posing the question determine the content of the answer. There is no singly satisfying answer.

The purpose of this book, Heller tells us, is "to provide a listener's guide to Jewish music focusing on selected pieces which you are most likely to hear."

But if the extent of the author's success can be measured by weighing the content of the book against his stated aim, we can unhesitatingly write that the author's aim was expressed far too modestly. For the book reaches far higher than "merely" guiding the listener to Jewish music.



To be sure, Heller does provide "close-up" examinations of four distinctly Jewish pieces of music replete with musical notation and commentary.

But he also engages the reader in fascinating introductory discussions of a wide horizon of subjects regarding Jewish music. Thus, there is a chapter on psalmody and cantillation, synagogue music, folk music and art music.

Moreover, Heller plunges feet first into wider, if also more personal, discussions on a range of subjects connected to the somewhat large question: Why do we have music?

Heller's book is always informative, occasionally entertaining and constantly challenging. Familiarity with the mechanics of reading music is helpful though not essential to exacting full benefit from this deeply instructive and uniquely charming work.

Additional books on the subject of Jewish music that are recommended:

• Leibu Levin: Words and Melody, Yiddish Poetry Set to Music, Ruth Levin, Piano arrangements by Hanan Winternitz (I.L. Publishing House, Tel Aviv, 2005). This book is a tribute to a remarkable man (1914-1983) by his daughter. Levin was a prolific composer of Yiddish lieder.

• Leib Glantz: The Man who Spoke to God, Jerry Glantz, (The Tel Aviv Institute for Jewish Liturgical Music, 2008). This book is a tribute to a remarkable cantor (1898-1964) by his son.

There is so much to enjoy and by which to be inspired in Jewish music. These works and the music they bring to us can help transport the reader toward those places that convey that enjoyment and inspiration. –MBD

Extra funding available for low-income survivors

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Low-income Holocaust survivors will benefit from a substantial increase in funding that Circle of Care has received from the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (Claims Conference).

Founded 50 years ago, the Claims Conference has negotiated for the return of and restitution for Jewish-owned properties and assets confiscated or destroyed by the Nazis; obtained funds for the relief, rehabilitation and resettlement of Jewish victims of Nazi persecution; and administered individual compensation programs for Holocaust survivors.

Arnold Foss, director of communications and administration at Circle of Care, said the purpose of the funds is to provide supplementary care such as meals on wheels, transportation and home services.

Arnold Foss

He is trying to reach out to people who may not know about the program. "We have about $1 million (US) from the Claims Conference and $100,000 from UJA Federation [of Greater Toronto]," he said. "We're now serving about 400 people, but I'm sure there are more people that could use our services. I [estimate] about 13,000 Holocaust survivors live in Toronto. I don't know how many of these meet our requirements, but I do want to reach out."

Applicants must disclose where they were born, where they lived before and during the war, and prove that they earn less than $23,000 a year.

"Once they are deemed eligible, their application is forwarded to a service consultant who determines which services fit their needs," Foss said.

He said he also has emergency assistance funds for such services as dental and eye care from the Hungarian Gold Train settlement, aimed solely at Hungarian Holocaust survivors.

The Hungarian Gold Train was a train of approximately 24 freight cars containing personal property that was seized, confiscated or stolen by the Hungarian government from Hungarian Jews. The property was taken into custody by the United States Army in May 1945.

The settlement was reached in 2005 in Florida, after a class-action lawsuit was brought by Jewish Hungarian Holocaust survivors against the United States government regarding the handling of the property on the train.

The agency has an advisory committee made up of Holocaust survivors that oversees the application process. "These people are so knowledgeable about Holocaust history it amazes me," Foss said. "If someone tells them something happened on a specific date, they always know if the date is correct."

He said there are many low-income seniors, "and we want to meet their needs."

He has received thank-you letters from seniors taking advantage of the program, he said, "who told me that without this assistance, they would not be able to remain at home."

One client has dementia and lives with her daughter and son-in-law. "She receives three hours a week of personal care through the North York Community Care Access Centre. The family is on a fixed income and purchasing extra hours of care is difficult," Foss said. "The family has expressed the need for additional relief, as the stress of caring for their mother has become overwhelming. The fund provided the family with relief and the necessary help the mother needed."

Receiving these funds is not a privilege, but a right, he said. "The program has been successful in supplying care and keeping people at home. They are still surviving, and we are helping them survive at home."

For more information, call 416-635-2860 and ask for the Holocaust program.

Fundamentally unfair

There is no escaping the conclusion that European policy toward Israel has taken a harsher, more aggressive, fundamentally unfair turn. The Swedish proposal last month calling for the immediate recognition of east Jerusalem as the capital of an independent Palestine was an abrupt, jolting surprise to the government of the Jewish state. To be sure, the proposal was softened somewhat by the vote last week by the European Union (EU) members. But it is now clear beyond doubt that the original Swedish initiative was no aberration of foreign policy planning.

It was a harbinger of harsh, anti-Israel hectoring.

In her first address last week as the EU's new high representative for foreign affairs and security policy, Britain's Catherine Ashton severely condemned Israel.

"East Jerusalem is occupied territory together with the West Bank. The EU is opposed to the destruction of homes, the eviction of Arab residents and the construction of the separation barrier," Ashton said.

Her far-ranging screed against the Jewish state also derided the Netanyahu government's freeze of new construction in the West Bank, calling it merely a "first step." It did not warrant mention by Ashton that the Israeli prime minister's initiative in the West Bank inclines further toward the Palestinians than any of his predecessors. Nor did she find any reason to be critical of the Palestinians' steadfast refusal to resume negotiations with Israel. She inveighed against the Jewish state with the smug, self-righteous sanctimony that has become endemic in many parts of European "elite" society.

The media reported that after Ashton's remarks, a number of members of the European Parliament – undoubtedly emboldened by the tone and the content of Ashton's one-sided reproach of Israel – called for punitive measures against the Jewish state. The Irish parliamentarian Proinsias De Rossa called Israel's treatment of Palestinians a form of "apartheid."

At around the same time that Ashton was inciting her European parliamentary colleagues to further inflammatory rhetorical against Israel, a British judge actually issued a warrant for the detention of former Israeli foreign minister Tzipi Livni. As one political commentator in Ha'aretz noted, "criticism of Israel has become the language of choice in European discourse."

Not surprisingly, Israeli government officials reacted angrily to the newly aggressive policies by the Europeans. They noted that Ashton's remarks "cast a pall over relations."

"Europe would do better to promote agreement rather than division between the parties," an Israeli official told the media.

No one begrudges the Europeans' desire to see a genuine peace between the Palestinians and the Israelis. Indeed the vast majority of Israelis yearn for precisely the same thing. But it is a mystery why the EU believes it can help bring that peace nearer by bullying Israel and pushing it into a corner, isolated from the democracies of Europe, distrustful of their motives and thus disinclined to accept European involvement in the search of the thus far elusive peace.

No voice for fair play

I have not seen or heard any organizational voices raised in the Canadian Jewish community to protest against the unfair attack pamphlet issued by the Conservatives (Tories, Liberals spar over Israel, Nov. 26). The pamphlet was not simply an effort to tout the Tory record on Jewish issues but came close to libelling the Liberal party as anti-Semitic

Their first accusation, that the Liberals "willingly participated in anti-Semitic Durban I," is clearly outrageous and aimed quite obviously at former Liberal justice minister and MP Irwin Cotler and the Liberal candidate in Thornhill, Ont., Karen Mock, who were both part of the Canadian delegation at UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, in 2001. Rabbi Michael Melchior, who handled the portfolio for the Israeli government, specifically commended Cotler, saying "no one worked harder… to combat anti-Semitism and… Israel-bashing." In other words, the Tory pamphlet was defamatory and an attempt to undermine the courageous work of Cotler, Mock and other Canadian participants at Durban I.

Our community groups have previously recognized both Cotler and Mock for their many contributions in the defence of Israel and in the fight against anti-Semitism. Shame on those leaders in our Canadian Jewish community who remain silent when members of the community are unjustly attacked. However, I suspect that in the last few years the ties of some in our community to the Conservative party have become too strong and now overwhelm any sense of fairness on their part. They do not speak up in behalf of leading members of our community. Shame on B'nai Brith, shame on Canadian Jewish Congress, shame on all those in positions of community responsibility who have become so narrowly politically partisan that they choose to ignore unjust attacks on outstanding Canadian Jews.

Liberals have bad UN voting record

I'm sick of hearing the Liberals cry "low blow" over the Tories recent flyer mail-out (Tories, Liberals spar over Israel, Nov. 26). The beautiful thing about the mail-out comparing the two parties' policies on Israel is that the Tories can say what they said for one reason: it is true! I love former Liberal justice minister and MP Irwin Cotler just like the rest of you, but the facts speak for themselves. The Liberal party's abysmal voting record in the United Nations against Israel is a fact.

'Jew-hating' Jews

I am increasingly concerned about those in our community who delegitimize and deny those who have different views on Israel as somehow "self-hating." One could argue that these Jews, feeling inadequate at lacking the courage and conviction to move to Israel, feel the need to compensate by assuming the idealized character of the "tough Jews" of Likud and Yisrael Beiteinu. What is most concerning is they are becoming "Jew-hating" Jews.

Overspending on simchahs

Kudos to Avrum Rosensweig for calling it like it is. "Jewish simchahs are bankrupting us" (Dec. 10) is so true. It is a very appropriate title, because the simchahs are bankrupting us not just financially, but morally, too. The "keeping up with the Cohens" philosophy is especially upsetting in view of what is going on in the world. In "Anti-Semitism: the coast is clear" (Aug. 20), Rosensweig talked about the need for an investment to build an international shield to fight rising anti-Semitism. Such a fund is just one of many examples of where the money for lavish simchahs could be better spent.

Those who spend exorbitant sums for simchahs and the guests who believe their gifts need to subsidize those simchahs accordingly are living in a bubble. They are oblivious to how their lifestyle and the bubble itself could disappear in a moment. I have attended some simchahs with the tastiest food, but I have felt nauseated to observe the excesses. Exposing this decadent phenomenon is a good start. Now more of us need to act on it. Contributing to a worthy cause instead or in addition to whatever gift is chosen makes a statement. There is a lot more out there to think about than party planning, cocktail dresses and in some circles, how to dress "to kill" while being "modestly attired" in long sleeves and wigs.

Charitable fund strives to heal Israeli societal rifts

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

Thanks to Jeffrey Stutz, an independent public policy adviser in Toronto, it's now possible for Canadian donors to contribute via UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to the Jewish Federations of North America's (JFNA) Social Venture Fund for Jewish-Arab Equality and Shared Society.

Initially, the fund, which was established in December 2007 with endowments of $50,000 each from the JFNA (formerly known as the United Jewish Communities) and 21 private philanthropies, was meant not for small private donors such as Stutz, but for major donors and foundations.

But Stutz, who heard about the fund on a trip to Israel this past October, thought everyone should be able to give to the cause.

The JFNA intended it to be the first of several such funds, based on the idea of bringing together major donors with similar philanthropic interests, along with existing organizations operating in the field, to strategize together, combine resources and ultimately have a greater impact than each would have operating alone. But because of the global economic crisis, the Jewish-Arab Equality and Shared Society fund has been the only one that got off the ground.

In its first year, donors – among them the sole Canadian contributor, the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies (ACBP) – pooled together more than $1 million (US) to dedicate to the economic and educational welfare of Israel's minority Arab, Bedouin and Druze populations.

"This particular group of philanthropists looks at Israel and sees inequality in the distribution of resources between Arab and Jewish Israeli populaces. They see that Arab Israelis experience higher levels of poverty and unemployment than their Jewish neighbours, and they see a need for change in Israeli society," said Gail Zucker, the fund's director.

"They believe that providing equal opportunities to these populations and creating a shared society is not only the right thing to do for the sake of social justice and democracy, but that it will serve the state by bolstering the economy and fostering loyalty, and this will ultimately contribute to Israel 's safety and security."

Jason Soloway, vice-president of the ACBP, said: "Whether your interest is political, economic, security, or civil rights, improving conditions for Israel's Arab citizens is part of the solution.

"For me, it's a moral issue. It's just the right thing to do."

A first for the JFNA, both in terms of policy area and format, the fund has raised some difficult questions: should North American Jewish financial support go to Israeli Arabs rather than Israeli Jews? How true is the fund's underlying assumption that the state is at fault for current socio-economic realities? Is the fund's promotion of "affirmative action" ethical? Will it actually increase Israeli Arabs' loyalty to Israel? Is this a political move on the part of the JFNA to fight negative notions of Israel in North America, or does the fund, the product of the most mainstream North American Jewish group, represent a shift to a more critical tone in the relationship between the North American Diaspora and Israel?

The fund's contributors – who are currently setting allocations for this year, totalling $800,000 – see its emergence as a sign their once-marginal cause is moving toward the centre.

They say this shift started in 2003, after Israeli Supreme Court Justice Theodore Orr released his commission's report on the October 2000 Arab riots, which criticized the police for using excessive force against the rioters.

A second factor was the rebuilding of the north after the Second Lebanon War in 2006, when the JFNA ran an emergency campaign to help children in Israel's geographic periphery, many of them Arab.

While the JFNA has helped members of the Israeli Arab community before, until the venture fund, it has never advocated for their equality in such a politically charged way.

"I think it's a sign of the growing recognition of American Jews of the importance of addressing the needs of all of Israeli society. It's a significant statement and a sign of a growing trend," said Jessica Balaban, executive director of the Joint Distribution Committee's (JDC) inter-agency task force on Arab Israeli Issues, which is advising the new fund.

"For many years, there has been a small band of dedicated philanthropists and NGOs that have been working in the Arab Israeli arena, but the issue was on the margins of the American philanthropic agenda," Soloway said.

"The fact that this new fund is coming out of the JFNA gives it a 'communal hechsher.' It's an important and powerful symbol of progress."

But Malcom Dash, associate director of public affairs at the Institute of Zionist Strategies in Jerusalem, attributes the shift not to a genuine change in the perspective, but rather to a desire to be politically correct.

"This 'political correctness' has been in the making for some time – think Goldstone, settlements freeze, and Gilo," he said. "I view this trend with much gravity and see the North American Jews as parting company from Israel. This drift is very negative for the solidarity of the Jewish People."

In contrast, Gerald Steinberg – a Bar-Ilan University professor, CJN columnist and president of NGO Monitor, a watchdog group that promotes accountability for human rights NGOs in the Arab-Israeli conflict – suggests the fund was inspired less by a desire to appear politically correct to the general public and more by a desire to bring younger, left-leaning members of the Jewish Diaspora into the fold.

Supreme Court Justice Theodore Orr, far right, visits Um el Fahem for a first hand view of the site of the violence his commission was investigating. [Israel Sun]

"While there is a peripheral trend of this sort [of political correctness] – we see it in the emergence of organizations like JStreet and the New Israel Fund – the JFNA is not part of this," he said. "The federation system doesn't want to alienate this segment of Diaspora Jewry from the establishment. I hand it to the [JFNA] for not writing them off and for creating something to bring them in."

Steinberg said the thinking behind the fund is brilliant, because its potential donors would give to such causes anyway, and it's better to keep them "inside the family" and giving to an organization that has a JDC, Jewish Agency and Israeli government seal of approval and are subject to the JFNA's high standards of due diligence than push them toward more radical groups.

"You have Israelis with more radical agendas that take the money and give it to more radical organizations on the ground, and people in the U.S. don't necessarily realize what they're contributing to," Steinberg said. "[JFNA] has the potential to be much more careful in funding specific programs that will limit this kind of political impact."

Indeed, Zucker said that all 15 organizations that have received financing from the fund so far were subject to extensive due diligence.

Others have criticized the fund for promoting affirmative action, which they see as a form of reverse discrimination.

Howard English, vice-president of strategic communications at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said that people can donate to the fund through his organization, but the federation will neither allocate money nor solicit contributions to it: "We have made a strategic decision to focus on strengthening peripheral communities [in Israel]. We do not support any programs that are exclusively for Arab Israelis."

Others say the fund blames Israel for the economic and social conditions of Israeli Arabs – which is also controversial.

In a recent article in the Jerusalem Report titled "Jews for a Just Society," the chair of the new fund, Carol Smokler, said that in 2007, 51 per cent of Arab families and 62 per cent of Arab children were living under the poverty line, compared with 15 per cent of Jewish families and 24 per cent of Jewish children. She also noted that only 22 per cent of Arab women were in the labour force, compared to 76 per cent of Jewish women.

But to blame this situation completely on Israel is unfair, Dash said. "Like the haredim, whose men spend their days studying in yeshiva and consequently do not earn an income, Arab culture discourages its women from seeking outside employment and this, too, contributes to their lower income status."

Another assumption, critics charge, is that improving the condition of Arab Israelis will deepen their loyalty to the state, noting that Israeli Arab Knesset members often speak out in loyalty not to Israel, but to the Palestinians.

Dan Diker, senior foreign policy analyst at the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, said that although Israeli Arab leaders are often hostile to the state, the actual population is loyal, by and large.

The competition for Israeli Arabs' loyalty is pretty stiff, with Israel up against strong Islamic influences and a Palestinian Authority that has launched what Diker calls a "discreet diplomatic jihad," which accuses Israel of apartheid, occupation and war crimes.

"[Israeli Arabs] are being incited daily by Al Jazeera and Palestinian media to break away and join this narrative against Israel," he said. "The Arab Israeli public can be made to be loyal to the state and we can enhance loyalty and good citizenship by investing in them and in making Israel an honourable place for Arab Israelis to live and work."

Dash is less optimistic. "I'm all for economic improvement in the Arab sector, but I firmly believe that this will not affect their ideology," he said, pointing to what happened after Israel's Gaza pullout in 2005.

"When Israel withdrew… the Palestinians were faced with a number of choices. They could have taken the many hundreds of millions of dollars that the European community was prepared to advance to them and turn the strip into a Singapore of the Middle East. Instead, they turned Gaza into a military camp with the sole aim of destroying Israel – this at great economic sacrifice to the Gazans, who had overwhelmingly voted for and supported the Hamas regime… For the Palestinians, ideology trumps economic advancement.

"Until there is a final settlement between Israel and the West Bank Palestinians, it is most unlikely that Arab Israeli loyalty to Israel will be obtained," he said.

In her Jerusalem Report article, Smokler, whose family foundation is among the fund's founding 21, raised another point of dissension against the fund: "Sometimes North American Jews question our work saying that 'Arab Israelis live better than Arabs in the rest of the Arab world.'"

But she said this comparison is irrelevant, because "Arab Israelis are entitled to the same benefits and opportunities as Jewish Israelis."

Soloway, who said the ACBP intends to begin introducing other Canadian philanthropists to the new fund, believes Smokler's social justice argument will resonate with Canadians.

"I am optimistic about engaging Canadian Jewish philanthropy, because I believe Canada is a society with a deep understanding of multiculturalism and equality."

Ugly sibling rivalry

While anti-Semitism, and especially anti-Israel expression, is thriving and we must be ever-vigilant, our worst problem is insider hatred. We live in a world of intense sibling rivalry, much like the kind that led Cain to kill Abel. In an effort to find favour with God, one brother sees it as his right to destroy or delegitimize the other. We turn on each other rather than to each other. We cannot live and let live.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

According to tradition, the Second Temple was demolished because of baseless hatred between Jews. Jews stopped trusting each other. Instead, they were suspicious, finding fault and deficiency.

Look around. What do we see today? Jews hating other Jews, claiming that they're not really Jewish. Groups of Jews taking it upon themselves to judge other Jews. Is that possible? Only God can judge us. Surely, every Jew can decide to follow a path of greater ritual piety. But they can't hold the rest of us to those standards. And they certainly can't sit in judgment of our practice. It's as if they've taken over God's role of judgment, and that feels heretical.

Who can determine who is legitimate and whose prayers are acceptable? Who can determine who has the right to pray at public Jewish heritage sites such as the Kotel?

Recently, the police arrested a young female medical student for wearing a tallit (prayer shawl) at the kotel. Why? According to Halachah, at least as resolved by both Rabbenu Tam and Maimonides, women can wear a tallit.

But in 2003, the Israeli government decided to yield its authority to the haredi community and allow the haredim to continue their takeover of the Western Wall. They don't like women wearing prayer shawls while they pray, but there is no Jewish reason to prevent it. Just as some women listen to the shofar from which they are exempt and many take on the obligation of procreation, even though they are rabbinically exempt, no one can tell me that exemptions mean prohibitions!

So why arrest her? Because the state was acting in a cowardly fashion, in fear of the haredi community and not in consort with Jewish tradition and our heritage.

Who gets to define the correct type of observance? Why can't we agree to disagree, to let different approaches to Jewish law and tradition live side by side? Why not accept our diversity and see it as vibrant, not an outrage? Who is to sit in judgment of brothers and sisters? Our public places should be a celebration of diverse expressions and not a source of ugly sibling rivalry.

The confidence to take Torah in new directions

"I thought this was the Jewish community centre."

I was leaving the Vancouver JCC when I was caught up in a wave of toddlers coming out of the Rothstein Theatre where a children's show was being performed.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

These words were spoken by a young teen walking in front of me wearing a black kippah and tzitzit. I lost it.

I did something I rarely do when teens are involved. I followed him and touched his arm. "Did you just say…?" I demanded. "Yes," he replied, obviously nonplussed at being accosted by this strange woman.

"Well," I snapped, "I do hope that they're not teaching you that at your school." I pointed to his kippah.

"I'm sorry," he mumbled and tried to escape quickly, which was difficult owing to the sea of urchins trapping us.

This is Vancouver. Most of those children and their parents were Asian, which obviously had prompted his snide remark.

What, I thought, was he being taught? Worse, had he acquired that attitude at home?

It was not so long ago that ideas of racial exclusiveness and superiority were rampant in the world, and these ideas didn't turn out so well for us between 1939 and 1945. Why then, at this time in North America, would a young boy think it's clever to dis a group of preschoolers?

We live at a time of unprecedented openness and opportunity for Jews. There are no barriers to university, to professions, to business opportunities or to anything we could aspire to do or become. Yet obviously, somewhere hidden in attitudes of either school or home, the idea of Jewish exclusiveness, of superiority, still incubates. Is the concept of being part of a wider community, to which we can offer access and enrichment – at no cost to ourselves – slipping away?

What would he say to the day school kindergarten group that my granddaughter attends? Would he sneer at her blond hair and blue eyes? Or at the Asian child in her class? As daughters of converts, are they considered to be outside the circle of light? Am I making too much of a snarky remark made for a quick laugh?

I hope so.

Long ago, I was told a story about the Rav, Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik. Supposedly he lamented as his life drew to a close, "I have no talmidim," meaning no students to follow him as he tried to combine the life of Torah with the best intellectual traditions of the wider world.

I can only hope that this story exaggerated a distress that the aging teacher felt. The Rav set a standard that would elevate all learning, religious as well as secular, to a higher plane of holiness, of kedushah. Yes, we need the scholars who dedicate a lifetime to learning. But if that learning teaches that Jews are above the general world – that they have no duty to community and no respect for others – then indeed we have come to a narrow place, one that leads to a dead end.

It's easy to build up walls. It takes no effort to construct a closed community, where a sectarian life can be lived within artificial, or even real, barriers to interacting with the larger world. And, yes, sometimes we can be so totally swallowed up in the general world that Jewish thought and praxis seem a burden. But I have more faith in Judaism's tradition, history and faith practices than that.

In a drashah earlier this month on Parshat Vayeshev, Arnold Eisen, chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary, dares us to "figure out what it means, here and now, [to bring] all our full participation in the larger culture to bear. To make Torah an effective force for justice and compassion in our communities, our society, and our world. To build communities of Torah that don't just preach those virtues, but practice them. In a word: to settle into Judaism the way our parents and grandparents settled into America. To use the home we have as a base from which to take Torah to new places and in new directions."

Scary? Difficult? That's the fun, and the challenge.

The importance of our festivals and holidays

By the time this article appears in print, Chanukah will be over. While the bright lights of Chanukah remain fresh in our minds, it seems fitting to reflect on the role that festivals and holidays play in the Jewish calendar.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Jewish holidays can be categorized in a number of ways. We have religiously prescribed holy days, such as Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and Simchat Torah. We have festivals that are tied to the seasons and the agricultural year, such as Sukkot and Tu b'Shvat. We have holidays related to Israel, such as Yom Ha'atzmaut and Yom Hazikaron. And we have holidays that are tied to historical events, such as Chanukah, Purim and Pesach.

It has been said that our historical holidays can be summed up in a few short sentences: "They hated us. They persecuted us. We fought. We won. Let's eat."

More seriously, the holidays recall historical events that carry with them a message for future generations. They recognize milestones in Jewish history that have played a formative role in shaping our heritage and in defining the Jewish experience. At the same time, they formalize an occasion or an opportunity for family, friends and community to embrace their heritage in both a reflective and a celebratory atmosphere.

For example, Chanukah marks a time to recall the bravery of a small group of courageous forefathers, the Maccabees, in confronting religious suppression, a struggle symbolically recalled through the miracle of oil that served to rededicate the Holy Temple in Jerusalem. Some modern historians have cast doubt on the widely accepted veracity of the traditional Chanukah story. But why does this matter?

Chanukah reminds us of the historical repression of Judaism and the need to face this challenge in every generation. While we hopefully remain mindful of that message, the modern celebration of Chanukah is an occasion of joy, bright lights, family and friendship.

Purim is also an occasion to recall persecution against Jews. Our reading of Megillat Esther, as well as Purim shpiels, songs, graggers, costumes and hamentashen draw us together as a community for religious and cultural purposes. While the threat of annihilation is no laughing matter, our Purim customs add some levity to our observances and remind us not to take ourselves too seriously.

Pesach arrives somewhat early this year and, as we anticipate the coming of spring, our minds will turn to the memory of our journey from generations of slavery in ancient Egypt to freedom.

Some scholars have examined whether the story of the Exodus is historically accurate and whether there could be a scientific explanation for the events. In the 2006 documentary titled Exodus Decoded, filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici and producer/director James Cameron attempted to do just that. While interesting and well produced, in my opinion, this fascinating film invites the same observation as mentioned above with respect to Chanukah – namely, why does it matter? It's the message that's important.

In every generation, Jews must be vigilant in confronting hatred and discrimination. In fact, the message of Pesach transcends the Jewish experience and has been adopted by others in their struggle against slavery and repression. This message was immortalized, for example, in the African-American spiritual Let My People Go.

At Pesach, we are commanded to experience the Exodus as if we had been present during this historical struggle. But it's also a festive occasion, when once again, family, friends and even strangers in the community gather together at a seder and enjoy traditional food, songs, stories and traditions. It's an opportunity to spend precious time with those dear to us.

Although our festivals and holidays have their own traditions that may vary from family to family and from country to country, they also provide a time for reflection on the message that has been passed down from generation to generation. Our holidays also serve as a vehicle to preserve our culture and traditions and celebrate our heritage.

Employment program targets young professionals

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

The economy is in shambles, job interviews are terrifying and no one will take your business card.

Helen Wilkie

That's where Jewish Employment Toronto (JET) comes in.

JET, a joint initiative with the Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP) and Birthright Alumni Committee (BAC), offers programming and social networking opportunities for Jewish young professionals aged around 22 to 34.

Launched late last month, JET combines lectures from successful businesspeople and workshops on topics such as networking and resumé writing.

"[JET is for] skilled professionals who are really unhappy with their current position or who are just having difficulty finding employment," said Shira Webber, a JET organizer, adding that it can be used as a support system for recent graduates. "You're out there to fend for yourself. There's no real guidebook of what to do once you've graduated."

The idea for the program was born this past summer and has taken several months to organize. For Weber, who moved to Toronto from Montreal about two years ago, JET's filling a void.

"I didn't really feel, as a new person to Toronto, that this existed," she said. "I lived in Montreal – they do have a variety of social networking groups that I was part of. I looked for that and didn't find it here."

Shoshana Allen, JUMP's program and marketing manager and a JET organizer, said that social networking programs are available in Toronto but few target Jewish professionals.

"All of these things are available somewhere else, but the point is doing it in a Jewish context," she said. "It just brings [participants] closer to their own identity and to meeting other Jews. It builds a stronger and more unified Jewish community."

So far, JET, which is funded by private donors, has held two events, a lecture given by Joelle Adler, the CEO of Diesel Canada, and a networking workshop with Helen Wilkie, a professional speaker and workshop leader.

Wilkie, who had about 50 participants at her workshop, sees the program as an important networking opportunity.

"Young professionals... have access to other people who can help them through the obstacles of the business world," she said, adding that networking is easier when it takes place within organizations such as JUMP, BAC or JET.

"I always say if [young professionals] are active in a religious organization, this is a great place to start your network. It means you have something in common with these people, something that is a major part of your life," she said.

Wilkie sees a bright future for JET.

"The people running it now appear to be very enthusiastic and very confident," she said. "They've got some good ideas... I see no reason why it shouldn't succeed."

Some of these ideas include a referral group, which would meet monthly.

The group would include one representative from several selected professions and would encourage participants to refer friends and family to these professionals.

JET's next event, on Jan. 21, is a talk by Michael McGauley, a professional speaker. McGauley will discuss the importance of persistence in business and personal life.

Anti-Semitic episode lands man in jail

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A Thornhill, Ont., man who spewed "anti-Semitic profanities" and threatened a Jewish man and his young son with a knife in front of their home will spend six months in jail.

Matthew Veersasammy, 28, will also serve three years probation following his release with conditions that include doing cultural-sensitivity training.

Last month, Veersasammy pleaded guilty to criminal harassment, assault with a weapon and possession of a concealed weapon. He was sentenced on Dec. 11.

York Region Police Det.-Sgt. John Sheldon said Veersasammy was walking his dog in the Bathurst Street and Clark Avenue area in Thornhill on Sept. 11 when, unprovoked, he began yelling "anti-Semitic profanities" at the 43-year-old father and his 11-year-old son, who were standing at the end of their driveway.

Sheldon said that when the victim warned him that he would call the police if he didn't leave, Veersasammy pulled out a knife and threatened to kill him.

"The police had a description and with help from the neighbours, we could locate where the accused lived," Sheldon said.

He added that hate crimes are always taken very seriously by York Region police.

"This type of behaviour is not tolerated and will be treated severely before the courts. This is a fairly significant sentence and rightfully so," Sheldon said.

Len Rudner, Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario regional director, said CJC was asked to provide a statement for the sentencing hearing about the impact that hate crimes have on a community.

In it, he wrote that "the rise of Nazism and the ease with which Jews were marginalized within societies in which they lived for centuries also demonstrated that integration into a society is no guarantee of safety. For our community, the lessons of history are not easily forgotten."

In an interview with The CJN, Rudner said that this conviction "really demonstrates the commitment that the police and the crown have to pursuing justice, and I think the citizens of York Region should feel good about the commitment that [they] demonstrated on this particular matter.

"It's important for a message to be sent not only to the perpetrators but to the wider community that... there is a special abhorrence that society holds and expressed when criminal acts are motivated by hate," Rudner added.

Investors lose $27M in alleged Ponzi scheme

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An alleged Ponzi scheme linked to an Israeli-born businessman is said to have bilked more than 70 investors out of $27 million.

Forty-two year old Tzvi Erez is facing criminal charges in connection with the scheme. Erez, who moved to Canada as a teenager, faces seven counts of uttering forged documents, fraud and failure to comply with probation. At the same time, Erez and a number of companies he controlled have been declared bankrupt and a court-appointed receiver found that Erez used fraudulent or forged documents to raise millions of dollars.

"Investors would be provided fraudulent documentation, including forged purchase orders, invoices and other documents to support what was presented as a highly profitable, yet under-financed print brokerage business," the receiver's report, filed in court, stated.

As described in the receiver's report, Erez, who operated a small printing business in Richmond Hill, offered investors a hefty return for short-term financing he said he needed to complete large contracts.

One investor who spoke with The CJN, who did not want his name used, said he lost more than $1 million with Erez. Investors, who were mostly from the Jewish community, were enticed by potential deals that offered 10 per cent profit in one month, and Erez presented written orders and other documentation to substantiate the business, the investor stated.

"It was all based on deals, that's how he presented it," he said. "He wasn't a typical salesman. He was well known in the community, very polite. He didn't make waves… Most investors and creditors knew him and his family for many years."

Erez once performed at a pianist at a concert for Beit Halochem, a popular organization that aids wounded Israeli soldiers, the investor pointed out.

Relying on world of mouth, Erez drew more people into his schemes, which for a time paid well, the investor said. (Ponzi schemes rely on the infusion of cash from new investors to pay off earlier debts.)

According to the receiver's report, little is left of the millions that flowed through Erez's various businesses. The receiver noted that Erez stated during the investigation that the money was gambled away online.

The investor suggested greater efforts should be made to track down the money, much of it invested only in the last year or two.

Jeanille John, a detective with the Toronto Police Service's fraud squad, said the investigation is focusing on the alleged domestic fraud and not on following the money trail abroad. She said the charges laid so far are in connection with a single complaint received by police. Only two other family groups have come forward with specific complaints, and these are being investigated.

None of the many other alleged victims mentioned in media reports have come forward with complaints and supportive documentation, she said.

Lawyer Lou Brzezinski, who represents the receiver and creditor Glickma Investments, said tracing the money is problematic. While a court order gives him broad investigative powers, such a legal document has little practical effect in conducting inquiries abroad. If, as is suggested, the money was lost through online gambling, several foreign jurisdictions would be involved, including one hosting the server computer, another where the Internet service provider is located, another for the owners of the gambling site and yet another where the money might be located.

"It's virtually impossible to get the right court orders to get this enforced in other jurisdictions," he said. "It would be very expensive, time-consuming and even then, we might not get anything back."

Court documents disclose that his client got involved after being introduced to Erez by a third party. An affidavit filed with the court indicated that Glickma was offered three deals based on what later appeared to be forged purchase orders in favour of Erez Graphics paying between nine per cent return for 58 days and 14 per cent return for three months and 6.25 per cent return for 75 days.

The whole thing appeared plausible, Brzezinski, a lawyer with Blaney McMurtry, said.

"Erez didn't get 70 intelligent business people involved because he could play piano. He was smart."

Efforts to reach Erez or his lawyer for comment before The CJN's deadline were unsuccessful.

I will never forget

By ALYSE DAN
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

Last spring, I took part in a trip organized by March of the Living, in which I travelled to Poland and then to Israel. March of the Living is a Jewish organization that takes 16- and 17-year-olds for two-week visits to Poland and Israel, both places of historical importance for Jews.

During the trip, we were to visit concentration camps and reflect on the Holocaust. The job of the participants was clear: to ensure that the world will never forget what our people, as well as so many others, went through. We all attended seminars and workshops to prepare for the journey, but no matter how long or how much I tried to prepare myself, nothing could have readied me for what I saw.

What I saw was evidence of the deaths of millions who deserve to never be forgotten.

Our trip began in Poland, the place where six million innocent people were brutally murdered in a place many of them called home. We arrived in the evening on April 17, and by the evening of April 18, we were ready to leave. We couldn't take a step without thinking about those who had died there. We travelled to concentration camp after concentration camp, seeing places that were designed to kill the most Jews in the shortest period of time while making sure to embarrass them as much as possible.

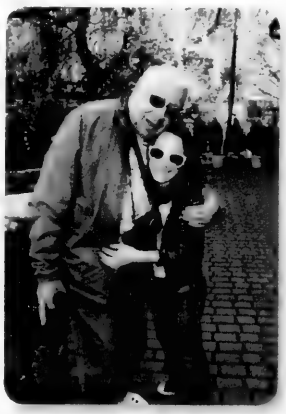
We saw gas chambers where my family members and so many others suffocated until their wretched deaths, and we saw where their bodies were taken and burned into ash.

Over the course of a week, we travelled to Treblinka, Plashow, Auschwitz, Birkenau and Majdanek – five places we walked into fully aware that if something were to go wrong, we could all simply leave without a second thought. Five places that millions walked into, never to leave again.

It took me a while to fully process what I was experiencing. The first concentration camp we visited was Treblinka. I remember feeling numb upon walking into this foreign place. As I looked around the camp – once a place filled with buildings that held horrible secrets – I could not feel anything besides numbness. The camp was now barren and held no resemblance to the one that once existed. All that remained were bleak tombstones remembering those who had been murdered. I looked around at the sights in front of me, but inside, it felt as if I had walked outside on a cold winter's day in nothing but a T-shirt. I was completely hollow inside. As we continued on our journey to Plashow and then to Auschwitz, I continued to feel nothing. I tried so hard to be sad or at least to cry, but nothing would come.

On April 23, all 9,000 March of the Living participants from around the world took part in the annual March of the Living from Auschwitz to Birkenau. The march is held each year in contrast to the Nazi death marches that hundreds of thousands of Jews and others were forced to undergo toward the end of World War II. Many of the prisoners perished during these gruesome marches. We completed the very same walk in total silence, holding hands with those next to us.

As we entered Birkenau, the sight was startling. In the middle of the camp there were train tracks, the very same that had led millions to their deaths.



Alyse Dan and Holocaust survivor Amek Adler

Everywhere you looked, you could see smashed buildings, and at the very end of the camp were the gas chambers, which lay in ruins. The wires that once gave power to these sick buildings stuck out from the ground as if they were tree roots that had been there for hundreds of years. These "roots" held the secret stories, wails and screams of the six million who perished. They are our history, our roots.

My eyes followed the wires until the end, where my focus blurred until it zeroed in on the broken walls around me. There were scratches etched into them. These were the scratches made by people trying desperately to hold on to every last inch of life that they could. These were the scratches of lost hope. As I ran my fingers along the rubble, I felt the cool chill of death pass through my body. I could feel the ridged surface beneath my fingers, each new mark representing a new death. My hand suddenly began to sting, as if the sorrow and pain etched into these imperfections were slicing into my hand and seeping into my heart.

Eventually we made our way into the barracks, where the victims were forced to live. It was there that we first heard survivors talk about their experiences in the war. It was there that my numbness began to fade. My body, which had been frigid and cold, suddenly began to feel as though it was on fire.

My emotions startled me, and at first I could not really make sense of what I was feeling. Still trying to make sense of it all, I continued to listen to the survivors' amazing stories, then suddenly I began to cry. Hot, searing tears began to fall from my eyes, and I was struck with a sudden realization: I was angry.

I was mad that someone could do something so monstrous as murdering innocent people. I was mad that the survivors who had gone with us on the trip, as well as their family and friends, had to suffer so much at the hands of evil. But most of all, I was angry at the unfairness of it all. I was mad that after spending a few mere hours in a place where so many entered never to leave again that I could simply just walk out without a second thought. I stood there in the barrack, rooted to the spot, my hands curled into fists at my side with burning tears rolling down my face. I had never felt so angry. My whole body was shaking with uncontrolled rage. It was at this point I realized that I would be sure to never forget, and I would make sure that the rest of the world did so as well.

I left on this trip a naïve girl, but came back a changed woman.

How do you come back from a trip like this and return to normal? The answer is simple: you don't. I had grown up knowing the facts of the Holocaust, but it never seemed real to me. Now it is more real than ever, for I saw the evidence first hand. Millions sat by and did nothing while millions more died at the hands of the Nazis. It is up to us to take a stand and fight to ensure that a Holocaust never happens again.

The world can still be evil and hold prejudices. No war will ever be able to stop that from happening. All we can do is never forget and make sure to never let another Holocaust happen again.

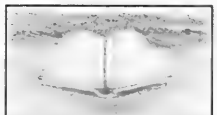
My name is Alyse Dan, and I will never forget.

Alyse Dan is a grandchild of a Holocaust survivor. She was a participant in the 2009 March of the Living.

Jewish Life

Taking the path to Jewish learning

By RABBI ELIEZER BREITOWITZ



Rabbinic Reflections

Anything worth doing in life has a high learning curve. Playing a musical instrument, writing poetry, designing a web page or performing open heart surgery all require extended periods of training. Doing them well may involve years of practice. Malcolm Gladwell writes in his 2008 book, Outliers, that to achieve true virtuosity one must be ready and willing to invest 10,000 hours.

To the best of my knowledge, only one activity is exempt from the 10,000 hour rule: watching television. Of course, this is to be expected. An activity that is fundamentally passive and sedentary should be easy to master. But can it compare to a craft or intellectual pursuit that challenges the mind and enriches the soul?

I would like to make one simple point: Living as a Jew is a task as complex and gratifying as any, and learning to do so is deserving of that major investment of time and resources. We must strive, as individuals and as a community, to promote universal Jewish literacy. "No Jew left behind" must be our motto.

We must acknowledge the spectacular achievements of Jewish educators to date. But we can and must do better.

According to the Talmud, providing basic Jewish education is a communal obligation. Today, cost-shifting has imposed a heavy tuition burden on parents. Unlike other forms of cost-shifting, however, where an obligation is assumed by those in a better position to pay, the young parents of school age children are often in a worse position than their better established elders. And although schools offer generous tuition subsidies, many parents are too proud to take advantage of these and consequently choose not to enrol their children in religious schools.

Schools that are not filled to capacity then engage in another cost-shifting measure: the burden that would otherwise be carried by the parents of a full class must now be carried by the smaller number of parents of the smaller class.

Our long-term goal must be to develop creative methods of funding our schools to minimize the cost-shifting tragedy. In the meantime, we must promote a change in attitude: there must be no stigma attached to accepting a tuition subsidy. Instead we must attach the stigma to those who would deny their children access to their rightful heritage. Giving our children a basic Jewish education must become a categorical imperative.

At the same time, we must promote a second change in attitude: Jewish education is not just for children; it must become a lifelong avocation for adults as well. Our synagogues, temples and outreach organizations have done much to provide opportunities in these areas.

I am reminded, however, of the chassidic rabbi who, after the charity appeal, reported to his wife, "I was only half successful; the poor agreed to take, but the rich did not agree to give." Here, too, the teachers have agreed to teach, but where are their students?

We all know the neophyte who drops in to the synagogue or temple expecting to experience enlightenment or ecstasy and ends up leaving in frustration. Through education, we can change this and make participation in a rich, satisfying religious life a universal experience.

Rabbi Eliezer Breitowitz is dean of Yeshiva Darchei Torah in Toronto

Marketing with morals

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

All too often, the financial news, especially when viewed from an ethical perspective, is disheartening. The talmudic adage that all people sin with regard to money is observed meticulously by too many. Yet, like complaints that most media stories focus on the negative, such is the nature of ethics that honest behaviour is generally not considered newsworthy.

Thankfully, most people are, for the most part, law abiding, and the talmudic adage noting that 100 per cent honesty is a most elusive goal. Whether this honesty is by conviction or whether it's due mainly to circumstance – many are in no position to easily commit financial wrongdoing – isn't really important. It's crucial that we recognize our weaknesses and not put ourselves in a position where immorality can even tempt us.

It was gratifying to see the Toronto Transit Commission turn down large sums of money when it recently refused to accept advertising from Ashley Madison, a firm that promotes adultery, an activity that Jewish law classifies under the category of "be killed rather than transgress" – just like murder. Moral principles are priceless.

Our society correctly regards the enablers of wrongdoing to be a greater threat than the perpetrators themselves. The drug pusher is treated more harshly than the drug user, as is the organized crime boss who never actually commits a crime himself. Aiding and abetting the moral failings of others – that is, being an enabler – violates the biblical command not to "put a stumbling block before the blind." Even if the "blind" don't actually stumble, the offering of ill-suited advice, be it financial or moral, is prohibited, not the following of such "advice."

This biblical mandate must resonate deeply with all those who serve in advisory roles (such as agents, brokers and counsellors) and those who wield influence over the moral behaviour of others, which includes each and every one of us in our capacity as parents, teachers or friends.

The obligation to avoid being a party to wrongdoing places much responsibility on the media to screen ads for their appropriateness. Governments both in Canada and the United States understand this, as seen by their banning of tobacco advertising, in consonance with Jewish law, which prohibits smoking. Jewish ethics however, goes beyond physical danger and eschews advertising that would negatively affect one's character.

While specific ads would have to be analyzed on a case-by-case basis, advertising that encourages people to live beyond their means would violate this principle. It was the encouragement of people to take on debt that they couldn't afford that led to so much financial pain. The recent statement from Bank of Canada governor Mark Charney warning Canadians about taking on excessive debt prior to the inevitable rise in interest rates was most appropriate.

Such moral sensitivity would also be demonstrated by a liquor company noting briefly the dangers of drinking and driving even as it legitimately advertises its product. Unlike smoking, drinking can be done in a responsible way, so there's no need to ban liquor, wine and beer ads.

A most tricky area is that of comparative advertising, in which companies highlight the superiority of their product by pointing out deficiencies in that of their rivals. While a business is allowed to state that its product is better than the competition's, businesses must be exceedingly careful that they're comparing "apples to apples" – for instance, that the exact same phone plan would run faster on a particular wireless network.

However, to highlight a particular flaw of the competition without noting its offsetting strength renders such comparison ethically wanting. Pointing out the extra features of your product over the competition's without noting the price saving that the competition offers unfairly converts a trade-off into a very questionable superiority claim.

Israeli officials singled out for legal harassment

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

It was widely reported in the Canadian media last week that Israel's Kadima Party leader and former foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, had to cancel a planned visit to Britain earlier this month upon learning that a judge there had issued a warrant for her arrest.

Sound bizarre?

In the Dec. 16 Toronto Star ("Ploy forces Israelis to dodge U.K.") Gregory Katz of AP explained: "Lawyers working with Palestinian activists are increasingly targeting senior Israeli political and military figures by seeking their arrest in Britain under the principle of 'universal jurisdiction.' This holds that alleged war criminals can be nabbed and charged anywhere, not just in a country directly involved in the crime."

These activists attempted to bring a charge of war crimes against Livni, who was foreign minister in the previous Israeli government during last winter's Gaza war. They also previously attempted to go after current Defence Minister Ehud Barak, as well as senior Israeli military officials, over several years on similar charges.

Israel has been outraged by these efforts to arrest its leaders and, following this latest episode, strongly protested – leading to a crisis in Israeli-British relations.

The message wasn't lost on Britain's government. In response, British Foreign Secretary David Miliband promised to reform a legal system in which, as it now stands, judges can issue such arrest warrants "without any prior knowledge or advice by a prosecutor" – that is, without the government having any awareness of what its judiciary, in private, is up to.

Still, it remains to be seen how soon Britain will act to end this "legal harassment," as Katz wrote, of Israeli officials.

Katz cited Yehuda Blum, a professor of international law at Hebrew University of Jerusalem, who argues that the concept of universal jurisdiction is being misused for political purposes and should be abandoned. If not, Katz quoted Blum, "Why not use this against Vladimir Putin over Russia's role in Chechnya?... There is no end to it."

Theoretically, while there may be no end to it, Israelis understand that, in practice, their own country is being singled out and isolated as part of a delegitimization campaign.

Israelis know that Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin has no need to fear for his role in Chechnya or, more recently, in Georgia. They know, moreover, that no leader of any democracy involved in warfare in the past decade or so has any reason to fear, either.

British Foreign Secretary David Miliband

Israelis, including many on the left, are responding angrily to what they see as a hypocritical double standard being applied to the Jewish state. They argue that political leaders such as Livni and Barak, who've tried to achieve peace with the Palestinians, should never have to face war crimes charges anywhere for justifiably defending their country against unceasing terrorist attacks.

Recent Israeli reactions to the double standard abound. Space allows for just one example. Highly respected Ha'aretz columnist Ari Shavit, in "UN must hold Obama to same standards as Israel" (Sept. 17), wrote the following: "No sane person in the world believes that the United States, Russia or China could be subjected to purist international law. The United States has killed thousands of innocent civilians in Iraq and Afghanistan and in the last few months encouraged Pakistan to make an extremely brutal military move in its Swat Valley. The United States was not required to account for it, because everyone understands that this is the price of the terrible War on Terror. Russia committed blood-curdling war crimes in Chechnya, while China deprives its citizens of basic rights and is conducting a wicked occupation in Tibet. They are not asked to pay for this, because everyone understands that you don't mess with superpowers...

"Only in matters involving Israel do international law and justice suddenly discover that they have teeth. Only when Israel is involved is the judgment administered out of context. Only Israel is required to uphold a moral standard no superpower or Middle Eastern state is required to uphold."

Israel is part of new Middle East, professor says

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Israel is fighting a new war in a changing Middle East, said Prof. Asher Susser last week at a lunchtime lecture.

"People would equate the Middle East with the Arab world. It's an out-of-date equation," Susser told an audience of several dozen at the lecture, which was sponsored by the Speakers Action Group, Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association and the Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University.

According to Susser, a senior fellow at the Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern Studies at Tel Aviv University, the current threats in the Middle East are vastly different from those 20 to 30 years ago.

"You can have a conversation over dinner for three hours, no one will mention Egypt. It will all be about Iran," he said. "The greatest threat to Israel is not from an Arab state at all."

Unlike the situation two or three decades ago, the three most influential countries in the region are Iran, Turkey and Israel, none of which are Arabic countries, he told the audience.

"Syria and Egypt are not as powerful as they once were. We don't face the kind of conventional military threats we have had to face in the past," he said, adding that Israel is now fighting a different war – the war against terrorism.

The greatest threat to Israel is Iran's current rise in the world stage, Susser said, adding that the country now helps arm Hezbollah and Hamas.

"If anyone attacks Iran, Iran will let Hezbollah and Hamas loose on Israel," he said.

In the past, he would have said that Iran was the bad news for Israel, and Turkey the good news, but this situation has also changed, Susser told his audience.

"The Turks, historically, have been very good to the Jews. Israel and Turkey were then two secular... states that had a common interest against Arabic fundamentalism. But that is changing," he said.

"Turkey is undergoing a radical metamorphosis... [the country] is emphasizing its Islamic identity."

Prof. Asher Susser

As Turkey is being pushed out of the European Union, it is trying to become a greater Middle Eastern power, which means embracing a less secular identity, Susser said.

During his lecture Susser, who was introduced by National Post editor Jonathan Kay, addressed Israel's position in the region.

"Israel is the third of the great powers, but Israel is not in the same league [as Iran and Turkey]," he said. "These are massive countries geographically... Israel is Israel."

Still, Susser maintained that Israel has had more success in the war against terrorism than many people realize.

Susser used the decrease in the number of suicide bombers in Israel as an example of this success, explaining that, instead of the conventional strategies of warfare used in the past, the government is now using deterrence.

This strategy was used in 2006 against Hezbollah and again in Gaza early this year, he said. While Israel did not occupy Lebanon and Gaza, it did demonstrate its military power.

"We withdrew from... Lebanon and Gaza for nothing in exchange... I would argue it wasn't a mistake," he said. "We prevent [our enemies] not by occupying territory, but by deterring them... we can give them much cause to think [before attacking]."

Survivors tell their stories to younger generation

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

In July of 1943, while in a work camp, Sally Eisner thought the world was going to end. The skies were filled with lightening and thunder, and the air was thick with the sound of gunshots.

Eisner, confused and scared, had no way of knowing that her parents had just been stripped down, told to stand in a line and shot by a group of Nazis.

This was the saddest day of her life. And last week, over a dinner of soup and chicken, she shared it with a group of young Jews.

Eisner, born in Poland, was one of about 70 Holocaust survivors to speak to approximately 450 young Jewish professionals at the fifth annual dinner of miracles. The dinner was sponsored by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem and the Azrieli Foundation, two organizations that promote Holocaust education and commemoration.

The event allowed young Jews to dine with Holocaust survivors and hear their stories first-hand.

For Shawna Samuel, the dinner's co-chair, the night was not about food. It was about dialogue.

"We really want to be honouring the survivors and their stories… when you're able to have that one-on-one conversation… I think it puts the face to the story," she said.

Samuel and co-chair Sherri Rotstein started the dinner five years ago, after finding out that many of their friends had never heard first-hand stories from survivors. This year, the dinner was so popular that people had to be turned away.

"Over 500 wanted to come," Samuel said. "I really do think that people are realizing that it's a race against time at this point. If they want to hear these survivors, it's really now or never."

During the event, Naomi Azrieli, chair of the Azrieli Foundation, spoke about the importance of active listening and the danger of silence.

"One can not help but be struck by how powerful the act of listening can be. The most important thing we can do is listen. And then we ask questions," she said, adding that, after the war, survivors did not share their stories because "many people did not want to listen."

While this silence has been broken, the Jewish community is facing a new problem, Azrieli said.

"Many [survivors] are no longer with us. As the years pass, there will simply be no eye witnesses," she said. "We are almost there. And this silence can never be broken."

For Hali Ahlfeld, 30, the dinner was an important reminder.

"It's so easy to get caught up in your own life," she said. "To [remember] how blessed we are – this just helps to remind us of that," she said.

Day program launched for Alzheimer's patients

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Circle of Care and Baycrest have teamed up to run the first day program in York Region for seniors with Alzheimer's disease, dementia and age-related cognitive impairment.

Clients, who can participate from one to five days a week, are provided with escorted transportation and kosher breakfast and lunch, and can take part in activities targeted toward their interests – including an exercise program, "news and views," creative arts, music and Jewish culture.

Kosher meat or pareve diet-controlled meals are prepared at Baycrest's kitchen and brought in through kosher Meals on Wheels.

The program's staff includes a social worker, a registered nurse, recreation therapists and program assistants, as well as a part-time social worker from the Alzheimer Society. It's funded by Central Local Health Integration Network (LHIN), Devora Schwartz-Waxman, a social worker and manager of the centre, located at 1600 Steeles Ave. W., said it's Circle of Care's first day program and the first time the two agencies have worked together on a project.

"It's necessary for both the seniors and their caregivers," she said. "In order for seniors to age at home, they need a variety of services, and that includes respite care for their caregivers."

Schwartz-Waxman said she realized how big the need was for such a service in York Region when 30 people expressed interest it it before it even opened its doors this past fall.

Before joining the program, clients are assessed by a social worker, nurse and recreation therapist to determine if it's suitable for them.

Toronto hosts think tank on social entrepreneurship

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Last week, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto hosted a two-day international think tank on Jewish innovation and social entrepreneurship.

About 30 people – social entrepreneurs (people who use a business model to address societal issues), researchers in the field, and funders – took part in the event. Approximately a third were Canadian, and there was one participant each from Sweden and from England.

The subject represents a growing trend and emerging sector in the Jewish world, according to Robin Gofine, the federation's vice-president of strategic planning and engagement.

Gofine has participated in North America-wide discussion about the trend since an initial meeting two years ago organized in New York by United Jewish Communities, the umbrella for North American federations, now known as Jewish Federations of North America.

At that meeting, she said, Toronto's federation was the only one represented. "I think the point at the time was that, organizationally, if we as a federation don't continue to nurture innovation, we're going to lose out on reaching out to young people in particular."

The recent Toronto meeting was co-sponsored by its lead organizer Jumpstart – The Network for Jewish Innovation, which is based in California; the New York-based Lippman Kanfer Institute, a think tank for innovation in Jewish learning that is part of JESNA (Jewish Education Service of North America); Jewish Federations of North America; and Toronto's federation; with support from the Andrea & Charles Bronfman Philanthropies.

Gofine said she sees the meeting as "a significant opportunity to embrace young people who historically may not have wanted to become involved with the organized Jewish community... It's an opportunity to enrich Jewish life."

As well, she said, it has created a group of peers, and she sees it as a way to "open doors to new groups of donors looking for new Jewish projects to become involved in."

Toronto was chosen as the conference site in part because of its "exciting and interesting models of innovative projects" including MaRS, a partnership of research institutions; and the Centre for Social Innovation, Gofine said.

Local participants included Risa Alyson Strauss of the Kavanah Garden, an educational Jewish community garden; and Assaf Weisz of Young Social Entrepreneurs of Canada.

Most of the participants work independently of the federation, said Gofine.

The Kavanah Garden – an organic teaching garden that has donated more than 400 lbs. of produce to tzedakah since it opened in the spring – is located on land provided by UJA Federation on the Lebovic Community Campus in Vaughan, but has not been otherwise funded by the organization.

UJA Federation is exploring the possibility of launching an "incubator" in Toronto, to provide support and possibly work space as well as other resources to social entrepreneurs.

"These people are the future of our community," Gofine said.

Panelists discuss "The Meaning and Importance of Social Entrepreneurship" at last week's think tank. From left, are moderator Shawn Landres, Jewish Jumpstart, Los Angeles; and panelists Nina Bruder, director of JESNA's Bikkurim, an incubator for new Jewish ideas, in New York; Marcella Kanfer Rolnick, vice-chair of GOJO Industries; Rabbi Aaron Levy of Makom, a downtown Toronto Jewish community; and Risa Alyson Strauss of Kavanah Garden.

Gene mutations can result in cancer

About 40 per cent of ovarian cancers and 12 per cent of breast cancers are the result of these mutations, and they're potentially preventable.

"There are options that she can elect for to reduce these risks," Metcalfe said.

"That could be preventive surgery, taking medications to reduce her risk of developing cancer or she could elect to undergo very vigilant screening. For breast cancer, she would look at having breast MRIs, clinical breast exams. For ovarian cancer, there are ultrasounds and blood tests she can take."

Although none of the 22 women in the first part of the study who carried a mutated gene were Sephardi, both Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews are encouraged to enrol in the second part of the study as long as they are between 20 and 70 years old, Ontario residents and have not had previous genetic testing for the BRCA1 or BRCA2 genes.

"What we ask them to do is complete several questionnaires, because it is still a research study – this isn't being offered as a clinical service yet – so there are several questionnaires that they have to fill out and then they provide us with a saliva sample," Metcalfe said.

Women who are found to have a mutation will be retested to confirm the positive result and will then receive personal genetic counselling and individualized cancer risk management options.

It might take up to a year to receive the results from the test.

Metcalfe anticipates that many Jewish women will want to take part in the next phase of the study. Within one day of the publication of the initial results, 1,500 women signed up for the second part of the study, which will start in March.

Metcalfe said her study group plans to make recommendations to the provincial government to make genetic screening more accessible to Jewish women.

"We're definitely going to do a formal economic evaluation. It makes sense to us that this probably wouldn't cost that much in terms of doing the testing as opposed to treating women for cancer eventually," she said.

"We will… see what the government might do with it."

To enrol in the study, contact Women's College Hospital at 416-351-3795 or visit the website at www.womensresearch.ca/jewishstudy.

Obituary

Green worked for Arab-Jewish amity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Until the day he died, Irwin Green was committed to improving the state of Jewish-Arab relations in Israel.

Green, an industrialist and philanthropist, passed away in Tel Aviv on Nov. 23, seven months after he fell, hit his head and lapsed into a coma.

He was 99, three months shy of his 100th birthday. He was buried at Pardes Shalom Cemetery in Maple, Ont., on Nov. 27. He is survived by sons Don and Richard, daughter Margo and five grandchildren.

Green's son, Don, the co-founder of Roots Canada, described his late father as a progressive who fervently believed in Jewish-Arab coexistence and amity in Israel.

"He was extremely committed to the cause of co-equality between Israeli Jews and Arabs. So much so that over the past nine years he devoted much of his time and considerable financial resources to the issue.

Irwin Green

"He was motivated by both his concern for civil rights, equality and justice and his boundless love for Israel. He felt that improving conditions for Israel's Arab community was a win-win situation, ultimately benefiting the country as a whole."

Green added, "I don't profess to be objective on this matter, but I still think it's safe to say that he did more for the pursuit of co-equality in Israel than almost any other Jew in the Diaspora. He was the biggest donor when it came to projects serving both Jews and Arabs in Israel."

Much of Green's efforts focused on Nazareth, Israel's largest Arab-populated city. He initiated and funded the following projects.

- The Irwin Green Family Early Childhood Development Center, which provides services for Jewish and Arab children and works with 400 special-needs children under the age of six.
- Two educational institutes, the Nazareth Ilite Technical College and the Meta Computer School.
- A Gates to the Future scholarship program to enable underprivileged youth to attend university.
- An after-school program for about 100 Jewish and Arab students in computers, graphic arts and cross-cultural activities.

In addition, Green supplied the funds for a soccer stadium, a fitness centre, a community centre, six tennis courts and a summer camp.

He also worked closely with the principal of a local Baptist school to establish after-school programs aimed at reducing bullying and cigarette smoking, and setting up a chess tournament and a Big Brother-style mentoring program for youth.

His last project, a girls' vocational school named after himself and his wife, Bethea, is currently under construction.

"The Green family is fully committed to staying true to the ideas and work of my father in Israel," said Green. "We plan to keep his vision alive in the Nazareth region, helping to advance the many projects and programs that serve both Jews and Arabs."

Green was born on Feb. 18, 1910, in Dnevpetrosk, Ukraine, the first of two children.

"His childhood was not an easy one," said Eli Rubenstein, the national director of the March of the Living Canada and a person who knew Green and delivered a eulogy at his funeral. "During the Russian civil war, up to 200,000 Jews were murdered during pogroms. Many of them [were killed] in the Ukraine. Irwin's own grandfather was murdered, though the circumstances were unknown. Irwin himself remembered hiding during the town's local pogrom."

In 1923, the Green family – including parents Maxwell and Anna and sister Helen – left Ukraine and immigrated to the United States. They settled in Detroit, Mich., where Green met his wife, Bethea Raepee. He married her in 1939.

After graduating from Wayne State University, Green practised law for several years. Being an entrepreneur at heart, he went into the weather-stripping business with his father and then, during World War II, the manufacturing of aircraft parts.

With the end of the war, Green founded the Century Machine & Die Company, which produced auto parts, mainly chrome for the wheelhouse and vents, for General Motors, Ford and Chrysler.

Starting in 1996, he began spending more time in Toronto, working alongside his son at Roots Canada.

A Zionist and supporter of Israel, Green was drawn to Nazareth after the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising in 2000, during which rioting broke out in in that mixed Arab-Jewish town.

As Green's son recalled, "One of his friends in Detroit asked him if he wanted to support a project to build a tennis centre in Nazareth for Arabs and Jews. My father was extremely receptive, especially after he discovered that 20 per cent of Israel's population was Arab and that they faced discrimination and a lack of integration. He was convinced that bettering their situation was not only the right thing to do, but would make Israel stronger."

And so his work in Nazareth began.

"He was most definitely a progressive," said Green. "I've never met a man who was more open-minded and flexible."

In recent years, Green accompanied his father to Israel and got involved in his projects in Nazareth. "Thanks to him, I discovered so much about Israel that most people, even many Israelis, don't know about the country."

Next April, Green and members of his family will attend a special memorial event in Nazareth in honour of his father.

"He was a revered figure in Nazareth, widely admired for his generosity and unswerving commitment to bettering conditions for Israeli Arabs. One of the city's top officials insisted on coming to his funeral.

"I find it fascinating that, at the age of 90, my father was able to identify one of Israel's most pressing problems. He was able to actually do something in connection with a problem for which there was no road map or prescribed solution."

In short, Irwin Green tried to make a difference.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Teen to serve as Winnipeg as Olympic torchbearer

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A Winnipeg Jewish teenager who excels at raising money for cancer research has been chosen to represent his city by carrying the Olympic flame for the last 300 metres through Winnipeg and lighting an Olympic cauldron at the Forks on Jan. 5.

"It's a great honour," said 13-year-old Noah Palansky. "There were a number of other people who could have been chosen."

Palansky, a student at Grey Academy of Jewish Education, noted that he was nominated by Mayor Sam Katz, who contributed to his fundraising efforts.

In many ways, Palansky is an average kid. He plays right wing on his hockey team and enjoys playing basketball as well. He takes piano lessons and is looking forward to starting drums. He's also in an advanced level in swimming.

Where he stands out is in his ability as a fundraiser.

In April 2008, his mother, Naomi, was diagnosed with a rare form of cancer. (She is doing well right now.) "The feeling when we heard the diagnosis is indescribable," the young Palansky said. "It's something that I will remember for the rest of my life.

"I wanted to do something to make a difference."

What he did was sign up for the CancerCare Manitoba Foundation's second annual Challenge for Life 20-kilometre Walk in June 2008. He solicited $14,000 worth of support that first time.

Last June, he registered for the walk again. This year, he personally raised $46,000 – more than any other individual participant – among 700 walkers – and his team of nine – "Chai Life" – was the top fundraising team.

How does he do it? Well, he asks everybody he knows and then some for donations. He went door to door in his affluent neighbourhood. He contributed money from his bar mitzvah gifts. He asked his classmates and was showered with $20 bills. He approached other schools.

He also started a program last year called "Kids Count," which tries to get other children to enter the Challenge for Life Walk.

"I got kids for six schools to participate last June," he says. "For the next walk, I want to get a lot more kids involved. I want to show people that kids can do this, too."

He has his own website – linked to challengeforlife.ca – where people can make donations. And his Facebook page has 500 friends so far.

Palansky's ultimate goal is to raise $1 million for cancer research.

Palansky and his family are excited about the coming Winter Olympics in Vancouver in February. He and his younger sister, Lexi, have collected a number of Olympic buttons that they've pinned to their winter coats.

"We tried to get tickets, especially for the gold medal hockey game," Palansky said. "But they were sold out. Olympic tickets are just too hard to get."

Our Shabbat dinner with Ryerson's president

By JESSICA GILBERT and MAIYA KEIDAN
Special to The CJN

Ryerson University Jewish students have come to know and love our Hillel Shabbat dinners.

Unfortunately, we face the regular burden of booking rooms. This painful experience acts as a near-constant reminder that there simply aren't enough rooms on campus available to students.

Guest Voice

Last year, Hillel enjoyed a meeting with Ryerson President Sheldon Levy, the goal of which was to discuss the current experience for Jewish students on campus. The administration was interested in creating a more welcoming environment for our students.

As the meeting closed and we stood up to leave, Jessica Gilbert, Hillel's tzedek and Ryerson program associate said, "Well, there is one more thing."

She asked Levy if he would host a Shabbat dinner in his office.

Months later, we began planning the event.

Tony Conte, Ryerson's vice-provost of students, remembered Levy being thrilled that people would want to eat dinner with him on Erev Shabbat.

Indeed, it was Levy who reminded us of our commitment, asking us at the beginning of this year when we would be going ahead with it, and he asked with as much enthusiasm in his voice as a kid going to Disneyland.

After several months of trying to find a suitable date, 30 members of the Ryerson community gathered together for Shabbat dinner last month.

Although the dinner wasn't in the president's office, Levy did take care of the room booking.

Hillel students spent a long time developing the guest list, which included student leaders, members of faith-based student groups and administrative staff of the university.

In addition to the Hillel student board members, student attendees included members of the Armenian Students' Association, the Arab Students' Association, the Muslim Students' Association, Students in Free Enterprise and the Ryerson Commerce Society and Discrimination and Harassment Prevention Services.

Joining Levy was Ryerson's vice-president of university advancement, Adam Kahan; vice-provost of students, Heather Lane Vetere, and the director of student community life, Glen Weppler.

We shared the beauty of our tradition and found many commonalities among the multifaith community we formed that evening.

At the end of the evening, Weppler turned to us and said, "We have to do this again and again and again."

For more information on this program or Hillel at Ryerson in general, contact hillel@ryerson.ca.

Maiya Keidan is president of Hillel at Ryerson, and Jessica Gilbert is Hillel's tzedek and Ryerson program associate.

Chanukah's a parable of unity and discord: Ignatieff

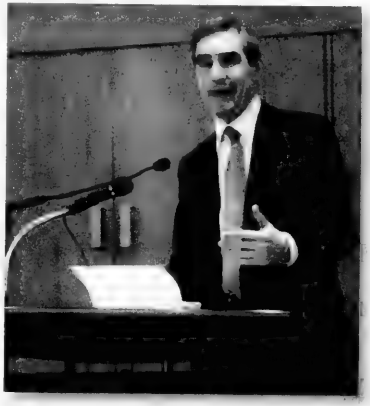
By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Middle East conflict can't be allowed to divide Canadians and isolate them into ethnic communities, Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff says.

Speaking at a Dec. 13 Chanukah celebration at Ottawa's Temple Israel on the topic of "Freedom in Today's Evolving Canadian Society," Ignatieff also took part in the lighting of the Chanukah menorah.

"I don't think my Christmas holidays can begin until I have lit the menorah candle in a community," he said.

"The Chanukah story is not just about an eight-day miracle. It's a parable of unity and discord. The Maccabean revolt was not, after all, a simple rebellion against a Greek tyrant. It was also civil war between Jews – those who had assimilated to the Hellenic culture and those who had not," Ignatieff said. "The Chanukah story also teaches us that the failure to accord equal respect in a diverse society invariably leads to conflicts not just between groups, but also within them."



Michael Ignatieff

Noting that he has lived and worked in Israel and that his party is a strong defender of Israel, Ignatieff commented on the recent flyers sent by the Conservative party into ridings with large Jewish populations.

They "basically accused the Liberal Party of Canada of anti-Semitism… calling [Liberal MP] Irwin Cotler an anti-Semite? That takes chutzpah," he said.

Ignatieff called on all of Canada's political parties to be "genuine defenders of Israel," and not to "pander to ethnic and cultural communities… that means saying the same thing to all Canadians, whether you're talking to them in a church basement in Trois-Rivières or a mandir in Brampton, a gudwara in Vancouver, a mosque in Toronto or a synagogue in Ottawa. We can never pick and choose which groups are entitled to respect and fair treatment."

"We have had a strong competition between political parties for the allegiance of the Jewish community. No party should ever take for granted the support of any community. A politician has to assume that there is no such thing as one Jewish community," said Ignatieff, noting that one of Jews' basic freedoms is to define their Jewishness in whatever way they choose.

"This is a secular truth of the Chanukah story – one with special meaning for us as Canadians. Our society is built on diversity… the most basic meaning of freedom in our society is the capacity to be who we are and wish to be, to achieve what we strive to achieve – no matter what our origins are, or where in the country we live," he said.

The event began with candlelighting and the singing of Chanukah songs, and concluded with the eating of sufganiyot.

HELPING FAMILIES IN NEED: The students at United Synagogue Day School, Bathurst campus, collected toys to make this holiday season happier for many children in the Greater Toronto Area. In collaboration with Jewish Women International, the toys were delivered to Blue Hills Child and Family Centre to be distributed to families in need. Seen in the picture are from left, Lauren Szpindel, Suyan Wang from Blue Hills, Louis Wynn and Daniel Wynn.

הסרט האמריקאי ביותר שנעשה עד היום

A SERIOUS MAN הוא סרטם החדש של האחים כהן, מגדולי במאי הקולנוע כיום, שזוכים להתהילה כולל סרטי אוסקר. באופן כללי אין בסרטיהם דמויות חיוביות והצופים שלהם מוזמנים על ידי מיטב היוצרים האפלים, כולל רדיפה בצע, מין, כוח וסתם רוע לב ישן ושוב. הפעם עוסקים האחים כהן בהודות דרך סיפור שמתרחש במינאפוליס של שנת 1967. גיבור הסיפור, פרופסור למתימטיקה יהודי , שבר תוך זמן קצר את כל הצורות שיכול אדם בגיל העמידה לשבר, כולל דרישת אשתו לגט כדי להתחתן עם מכר המשפחה, בן שגעב ומעשן מריחואנה ביום הבר מצווה שלו, נסיון סחיטה, ועוד כהנה וכהנה.

כל הדמויות בסרט מגעילות ודוחות בשקרים שלהן ובדיפה הבצע שלהן והן טולן יהודיות. סליחה, יש בסרט אב ובן קוריאנים ומשפחה שכנים גויה שגם הם מצויירים באור שלילי ומגעיל. שלושת הרבנים שבהם מנסה הגיבור להיעזר מצויירים כאפסים רדודים ועלובים. בסיפו של הסרט מתפתח גם הגיבור שמצייר כנבעך מושלם, לבצע פשע רציני שיעבר בשלום, כדרכם של היהודים של האחים כהן.

מאחר ומדובר בסיפור דמיוני אפשר לטעון שמותר לאחים כהן להגיד כל מה שהם רוצים. זהו חופש הדיבור הקדוש. אבל יד על הלב- אף גוי בעולם החפשי (אני לא מדבר על איראן או סודיה) לא היה מעז לעשות סרט כזה, כי הוא היה מיד מוקצה מחמת הפוליטיקלי אינקורקט, ואחרי שבוע היו תובעים אותו אלן דרשוביץ וחבר מרעיו בבית משפט פדראלי על אנטישמיות. אבל האחים כהן? להם מותר . "הם היו היו שם" אומר הגוי לאשתו בחיוך קטן- "הם יודעים את זה מבפנים". וכך, דרך סרט קטן ומאוס נוצר הסטריאוטיפ היהודי, וגם מי שלא ראה יהודי פנים אל פנים בחייו-יידע בוכות הסרט איך יהודים מתנהגים.

אם אתם תושבים שאני מניחם-הינה עוד עובדה מצמרירה: האם אתם מודעים לכך שיש באנגלית מלה ?to Jew פירושה הוא "לסבן" "לרמות", והרבה אנגלים אומרים don't jew me! יצני "אל תרמה אותי".

השנאה העצמית היהודית היא נושא כאוב ומאלף. בגללה, אומרים, נפל בית המקדש. שנאת החינם הזו ברורה בהמון אספקטים של החיים היהודיים והישראליים ונדמה לי שאין לה את ורע בשום מקום בעולם.

ההכללה שמביא הסרט הזה גדמת לדעתי יותר נזק מהתמונות מעזה ומדו"ח האו"ם של גולדסטון (גם הוא יהודי).

עצוב עצוב.

אפס בסולם קורן. תזהירו את כל תבריכם מן הסרט הזה ושישאר בינינו.

איך כבשה אמריקה את השלום-יהודם פירובקר

למרכימהשבירות ראיתי סרט דוקומנטארי, שעסק בגילגול נשמות בבייבס. על נזיר בודהיסטי צעיר וכריזמאטי, מטול הדאלאי למה לחפש נשמה ששרחה מגופו של כהן חשוב ומקורב, ונחתה בתוך גופו של ילד אלמוני אשר נולד באותו יום. מאחר וזהות הילד אינה ידועה, יוצא הנזיר חמוש בגלימה אדומה, קרחת ונעלי קונברס אמריקניות, לחפש את הנשמה הקדושה. בחיפושיו מגיע הנזיר לכפרים הכי נידחים והכי מבודדים שקמו על כדור הארץ. כפרים אשר מתוברים לשאר העולם בעזרת שבילי הליכה צרים ותלולים, אשר מתפתלים בין הרים, עמקים וקניונים עוצרי נשימה. המראות בסרט מרהיבים ביופיים והטכניקה בה משתמש הנזיר כדי לאתר את הילד בר המזל, מרתקת. אך מה שמשך את תשומת ליבי יותר מכל, היתה העובדה שכמעט לא היה פריים אחד על מסך הקולנוע שתרבות אמריקה, מודגיה ומצריה, לא תפסה בו מקום של כבוד. ואילו תיר מהחלל היה מבקר במחוז הנידח, אין ספק שהיה משתבנע שהולבות T, מכנסי ג'ינס, כובעי בייסבול ונעלי ספורט אמריקאיות, מהווים חלק נבבד מהלבוש הלאומי של תושבי האזור.

אפילו על מכשיר טלויזיה, (ברקע של אחד המרואיינים, מכשיר אשר יתי בוכות וגרשון מצ'קמק וצלחת ליוין), רואים על המסך פרק מסדרת טלויזיה אמריקנית פופולארית.

אז נכון שמקדונאלד, סטארבאק או הילטון עדיין לא הגיעו לכפר, אבל היום המאושר לא יבושש לבוא. ובינתיים, כאשר הצופים בסרט למדו שגילגול נשמות זה קצת יותר מתאורתי, למדתי אני, שאמריקה לא זקוקה למוסיף קרב, מנקים וחילילי מאריגם בפיקודו של ג'ן יין, כדי לכבוש את השלם. ביל גיימס, מדליין מדרו, קוקה-קולה, ג'ניפאל-מוזרים ושאר חברות העוק עושות עבודה יותר טובה מהמצאנען, ה-C.I.A. ודבית הלבן ביחד.

Israel won't face ICC, head of UN monitor says

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Even though the contentious, 574-page Goldstone report will percolate within United Nations (UN) and activist circles for a few years, it's unlikely to result in Israel going before the International Criminal Court (ICC), predicts Hillel Neuer, director of the Geneva-based UN Watch.

"Will it go to the ICC? I think not," Neuer told an audience of about 200 earlier this month at Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem.

The report, which outraged Israel and much of the Jewish world, was commissioned by the controversial UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC), an agency of the UN that's located across the street from UN Watch in Geneva. The report was subsequently endorsed by the UN Security Council.

In it, retired South African judge Richard Goldstone and his commission accuse Israel of war crimes and deliberately targeting civilians in Gaza during "Operation Cast Lead," a massive three-week assault last winter against Hamas targets in Gaza as a response to eight years of shelling civilians in southern Israel.

The outrage was especially pronounced because Goldstone is Jewish and was a respected human rights advocate.

Neuer said the report could go back to the UN Security Council in the face of Israel's refusal to launch its own inquiry – the report recommended it should do this, or be at risk of facing the ICC – but "you just don't have nine [out of 15 votes necessary]" to bring the case before the ICC.

In any case, the United States would almost certainly veto any such effort, he said. Alternatively, Neuer said the report could go back before the UN General Assembly in an effort to "keep it alive," trigger "national" lawsuits against Israel in individual countries, or the Geneva Convention could address it when signatories meet in the future. All in all, "the report will be very much alive for the next few years," Neuer said.

In his talk, Neuer heaped discredit on the UNHRC, which he said continues to have 80 per cent of its resolutions focus on and denounce Israel, a country – ironically, he noted – whose creation was supported not only by the UN itself but by renowned Universal Declaration of Human Rights authors John Humphries and René Cassin.

Sadly, he said, the UN has now become "public enemy number 1 of human rights," its agenda controlled by the so-called non-aligned bloc of nations composed of some of the worst dictatorships on the planet.

Neuer charged that the Goldstone commission was tainted from the start.

Even Mary Robinson, once the UN's commissioner on Human Rights, refused the offer to head the UN Fact Finding Mission on the Gaza Conflict out of concern over the UNHRC's bias against Israel, Neuer said.

Goldstone has repeatedly said he agreed to take the job only after his mandate was "changed" to include investigating possible human rights violations by all sides. But Neuer said that, legally, the mandate "never changed at all," since that would have entailed the UNHRC officially changing it. That never happened, Neuer said. The UNHRC was "silent, and silence and acquiescence do not change anything. The mandate was never changed."

Neuer also took issue with several other aspects of the commission. Its membership was not "diverse," as Goldstone has insisted, but rather its members were of like mind in pronouncing – even before facts were established – how "shocked" they were by what was happening in Gaza. "Why did they never say how 'shocked' they were [by the shelling of] Sderot over eight years?"

Neuer's appearance was co-sponsored by the Jewish National Fund as part of its Dinner and Learning series, and by the synagogue.

Ottawa Torah High takes off

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — In only four years of operation, Torah High's enrolment in Ottawa has almost doubled from an initial cohort of approximately 50 students to a high this year of 95.

For a strictly voluntary program for high school students that's held after school and for some involves travelling a fair distance from their regular high schools, the program's popularity speaks volumes.

A project of the National Council of Synagogue Youth's (NCSY) Ottawa branch, Torah High fills a void for what organizers estimate are the 95 per cent of Jewish high school students in the nation's capital who attend public schools (compared to the roughly five per cent who attend Jewish high schools).

Bram Bregman, executive director of NCSY Ottawa and a founder of the local Torah High, said the aim is to attract students to Jewish learning and give them a safe, convenient and inexpensive way to mingle with other Jewish teens.

Both credit and non-credit courses are offered, as well as a Mitzvah Action Course that lets students fulfil their volunteer hours. There's a tax-deductible $299 fee for credit courses, and the program is held in its own space, a lounge with comfortable couches, a television and snacks.

"We really want to create a place where they look forward to coming," Bregman said.

Staff strive to make the courses interesting to teens, he said. "The material has to be relevant to their lives today."

To that end, Bregman credits Rabbi Yehuda Simes, Torah High's director of education, for being a big draw.

"The main reason the Jewish teens decide to come out is because they like the people involved. They like the teachers, they like the staff, they look up to them and respect them."

This year, Torah High has five teachers and offers four credit courses, three for university preparation. The students attend a weekly two-hour class and must obtain an additional 30 hours of educational programming, which may include Shabbat dinners, guest speakers and weekend get-togethers.

Funding for Torah High is partly provided by the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, but it's also greatly dependent on fundraising.

Kathi Kovacs, chair of NCSY Ottawa, has been involved with the program since its inception. "Fundraising is tough, but with each year, the quality and growth of Torah High help to attract donors that genuinely care about the kind of Jewish education and mentoring that our community high school students get… we appeal to Jews from all persuasions, from well connected to the unaffiliated," she said.

Torah High began in Toronto but has been expanded to several other cities in Canada and the United States.

Bregman said the Ottawa program is the second largest, after Toronto.

"Every city caters to the local market, but ultimately it's the idea of Jewish students in a public high school coming out to take a class with other Jewish students," he said.

Kidney donor calls it greatest experience of her life

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Two years ago, Lori Palatnik, an author and Jewish educator, had what she describes as the greatest experience of her life.

Palatnik, the rebbetzin of Aish Hatorah in Washington D.C. – her husband is Rabbi Yaakov Palatnik – as well as a mother of five children and director of the Jewish Women's Renaissance Project, donated a kidney to a woman she had never met.

Lori Palatnik

Palatnik, originally from Toronto and formerly of the Village Shul, spoke last week at Aish HaTorah in Thornhill, at an event sponsored by friends of a 22-year-old in need of a kidney.

Her journey began, she said, when she was living in Denver, Colo., with her family, and she met a man who needed a kidney. "I Googled kidney donations and realized I was a good candidate."

She offered her kidney, but was told she was too small to help the man. She was disappointed, she said, but after moving to Washington D.C., she received an e-mail asking her to be tested for a woman who needed a kidney.

"I clicked back that I was willing to be tested, I filled out forms and I was accepted as a donor. I was tested for three Jewish women, and I matched two of them."

She told very few people, she said, because she was "hearing a lot of negativity," but her husband's rabbi told him it was a mitzvah.

"God runs the world, and when presented with a mitzvah, an opportunity to save someone's life, one should grab it, for it may not come again.

"To hold back, and live in a world of 'what if' could cost lives. How [could] I not give away my kidney just because it's someone I don't know? Somebody knows them. They are someone's wife, sister, friend and daughter."

When she asked the transplant doctor why people had two kidneys if they could live with one, "he told me that God gave you two – one to keep and one to give away."

Two weeks before the scheduled surgery, the woman was told she had a donor, and Palatnik was asked if she wanted to talk to her.

"I said 'yes, no, yes, no' and then decided I wanted an emotional connection. We talked on the phone for four hours. [She told me] she was my age, and had a husband and seven children. I realized, this wasn't just about her. It was about her husband, her children, her grandchildren."

The only moment she had any doubts, she said, was when she entered the operating room. "I freaked out. There were 30 people in the room, and there was a [table] in the middle where I was supposed to lie down. "I asked myself, 'What am I doing?'

"But, the next thing I knew, I was in recovery. The first person I asked about was this woman, and the first person she asked about was me."

Her kidney began working immediately in the woman's body, Palatnik said. "She was steps away from dialysis, and now she is almost perfect.

"She told me that it is hard to explain how she feels about me. She said it is like a truck was hurtling towards her, and at the last minute I pulled her out of the way."

Looking back, she said, "this was the purest opportunity I had to give. I felt better giving to someone I didn't know, because if you give to a friend, it creates an unbalanced relationship. When you give to someone you don't know, you are giving to give. If you knew the joy [it gave me], you would do it, too. The pleasure is indescribable."

She said she was speaking that evening, two days after the two-year anniversary of her surgery, "because a 22-year-old boy needs a kidney. Someone here can save the boy's life."

She is close friends with the woman now, Palatnik said, and plans on attending her daughter's wedding. "I thank God that He made it possible for us to meet."

John Anhang, director of the Toronto office of Renewal, a non-profit organization dedicated to assisting people suffering from various forms of kidney disease, said that the organization, started up three years ago in New York, helps recipients get kidneys from potential donors.

"We opened here in September with the [three-fold mandate] of raising awareness, making a match, and supporting the donor," he said.

"We make people aware of how devastating kidney disease is, and we make them aware of the opportunity of becoming a donor."

Renewal is also building a database of people who need a kidney and those who are donating a kidney. "We support the donor through every step of the process, including any out-of-pocket expenses they may incur. It's not about pressure or encouraging people. We give them the information so they can make their own decision," Anhang said.

For information, call 416-628-7633, 877-247-0616 or e-mail anhang.renewal@bell.net.

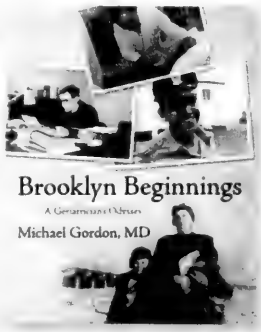
Autobiography of a geriatric specialist

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

Among the most heart-rending prayers in Jewish liturgy is the Avinu Malkeinu. (Our Father, Our Sovereign), a poignant, plaintive pleading – thousands of years old – of a series of deeply personal entreaties recited at Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. It is one of the central prayers of the High Holidays.

Within the Avinu Malkeinu, perhaps the most compelling entreaties, especially for those of us no longer in our youth, are the two that convey the hope that we retain our dignity in our later years:

"Al tashlichenu l'eyt ziknah;
Kichlot kochaynu al t'azveinu."
(Do not cast us aside in our old age;
When our strength fails us, do not abandon us.)



These two petitions, at the very heart of the High Holiday prayers, have become the emotional rallying point for the obligations of the younger generation toward our elders. Wherever Jews travelled and settled throughout the long, wandering years of our existence, we always established a moshav zekainim, an "old folks home," a senior citizens residence, among the first of our communal institutions.

More than an emotional rallying point, however, the words of the prayer have been viewed as a moral imperative for the community, betokening that deeply embedded into our psyches and our values are care and concern for the physical well-being and emotional dignity of our elderly.

It is in this context that Dr. Michael Gordon has opened tall windows of insight into the rarely viewed world of the geriatric care specialist with his recently published autobiography, Brooklyn Beginnings: A Geriatrician's Odyssey, (iUniverse, Inc., New York, Bloomington, 2009).

Gordon, a columnist with The CJN, was the first Canadian to receive a certificate in geriatric medicine. He has a gift for storytelling and a keen sense of recall for the myriad details of the formative and playful moments of his private life and of the medically profound moments of a pioneering, robust career in the medical care of the elderly.

His pre-geriatric medical years take him – and the reader – to Scotland, where he first studied medicine, and then to Europe and Israel, where he refined his medical training, and ultimately, to Canada, where he settled into his life's work.

The cases he recounts are more than episodes in a doctor's agenda or experiences in a hospital ward. They are paradigms of medical/forensic investigation. They are lessons about life. Perhaps most tellingly, they are insights into the ultimate issues that we all face.

'Thinking strategies' key to coping with change

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Along with sadness, sorrow and frustration, life changes such as job loss, illness and bereavement can provide opportunities for growth and moving forward, said social worker Allan Sheps in a talk titled "Managing change in today's society: Strategies to cope with loss."

Speaking at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation for a brotherhood program on Dec. 6, Sheps noted that unexpected loss is tougher to deal with than loss that is expected.

Typical stages begin with shock and end with acceptance, he said. In between are disbelief, then frustration or anger, "grasping at straws" (a feeling there must be something that can be done), sadness and "testing" of different solutions.

Allan Sheps

The latter phase is critical, because people come to terms with loss using solutions they try during that period, said Sheps, who worked for Jewish Family & Child Service for 20 years and is now in private practice in Thornhill.

Turning points in the testing phase could be attaining the ability to tell people what happened – and why – after losing a job, or to go out socially without feeling like a fifth wheel, Sheps suggested.

If people don't begin to test solutions, they withdraw, internalize their problems and blame themselves, he said.

People who tend to blame themselves are more likely to revert from testing into anger and frustration, Sheps added.

They may give up, attack or become critical, saying things such as, "You don't know what I'm going through. Just leave me alone."

In the Jewish tradition, however, the message is not to be alone, he noted. "In our faith, we have shivah… People help you stay connected to this world."

Still framing his remarks in a Jewish context, Sheps noted that prayer has benefits that may not be immediately apparent. It is "a dialogue with HaShem, [but] also a dialogue with ourselves… [By praying] we get to stay in connection with that loss. We're thinking about it, we're dealing with it, and we're actually moving through the phases."

Ultimately, he said, "when we can't change the situation, we begin to look at changing ourselves."

Strategies to reduce stress in the wake of loss include adequate sleep and proper nutrition, Sheps said. "Improper nutrition is one of the things people most struggle with in response to stress. Comfort food takes over and good nutrition goes out the window."

Regular exercise, social support, helping others, and keeping a journal are also known to help, he said.

Speaking to men in particular, Sheps recommended "as hard as it is sometimes, to share what's in your heart."

As well, he advised, "Live your dreams to whatever extent possible… Our stress is reduced by living our lives proactively."

Among several "reassuring thinking strategies" Sheps offered were:

- This too shall pass.
- One day at a time.
- Like everyone else, I make mistakes, too.
- I know I can do this. I've gotten through worse.
- This has made me a better person in so many ways.

"How we think informs what we feel," Sheps said. "And what we feel informs what we do." He said that "alarming" thoughts – the opposite of reassuring ones – induce stress and increase negativity.

"You limit your abilities by telling yourself, 'This is too hard, and there's no point in trying. I'll never get over this loss.' Until you're willing to engage in the testing phase, that remains true."

He said that people who tend to think in black-and-white terms have a harder time than those who can see both good and bad in people and situations. "Changing that style is critical to moving forward with happiness."

Sheps would encourage people who have difficulty moving forward after life changes – even after talking to friends or reading self-help books – to find a therapist or self-help group.

"I'm very keen on groups, because it gives you the opportunity to see how other people may be dealing with similar situations," he said. "If you're a very closed-in person, I recommend it even more."

Some books that Sheps considers helpful are:

- Feel the Fear and Do It Anyway, by Susan Jeffers;
- Feeling Good: The New Mood Therapy, by David Burns;
- Mind Over Mood: Change How You Feel by Changing the Way You Think, by Dennis Greenberger and Christine Padesky.

Gordon laments lack of empathy towards geriatric care

Gordon combines unabashed details of personal anecdotes with similarly unvarnished recollections of professional responsibilities and duties.

His honesty is as disarming as it is effective. At times, he laments the medical community's lack of empathy or understanding toward geriatric care. "Over the years, many of my medical colleagues have questioned how I am able to look after patients who are old, have many illnesses and may be quite demented. 'How can you speak to them with any real satisfaction?' I am often asked. I have frequently heard from medical trainees that some of their supervisors paint a rather negative picture of eldercare. I am saddened by this."

Dr. Michael Gordon

He describes with particular glee the happiness he felt when he accepted a joint appointment in Toronto at Mount Sinai Hospital and at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, where he has practised for decades. Gordon is currently medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest.

"With the establishment of the specialty of geriatric medicine at the Royal College in 1981 – and my receipt of its first certificate – there was no turning back. For the next 30 years, the practice of geriatric medicine became my passion, providing me with both inspiration and professional satisfaction throughout my medical career at the two organizations, both of which were affiliated with the University of Toronto."

Gordon's candour is his signature. "These latter years of my career… have helped me to become increasingly aware of just how much family and staff members alike struggle with the challenge of doing the right thing for those we care for. Professionals and family members share in a very difficult decision-making process. Those of us who are the professionals know, or may have already experienced in our own lives, what it is like to be on the other side of the bed as a family member. Having experienced both sides of the situation has certainly helped me to appreciate the enormous challenges, tenderness, poignancy and trepidation that we all face in these most difficult life-ending and life-defining situations."

He is never reluctant to write what, in the end, must be written: "I feel humbled and privileged to have played a part in the many life-defining moments of so many people and their families. They looked to me for care and advice and – from time to time – wisdom. And while wisdom may be most desired when a family is making such difficult decisions, in all humility, I recognize that it is the hardest attribute to come by."

Gordon has dedicated his professional life and done his utmost to ensure that the prayers we utter during the vulnerable moments of our lives, such as at Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, on our own behalf or on behalf of those we love, are not merely sharp-edged cries in the night or in synagogue.

It is due, in large measure, to individuals such as Michael Gordon that our parents and our grandparents are not cast aside in their old age.

Yalla Journal aims to humanize Israeli-Palestinian conflict

By MICHELLE BITRAN
Special to The CJN

Nearly two years ago, Asher Greenberg tried his luck at submitting a piece to Yalla Journal. Today, he is the director of its board.

"I went from nothing to leading the organization, which is not exactly how I planned it," said 23-year-old Greenberg with a smile.

Yalla Journal is a youth initiative that seeks to create a dialogue between Arabs and Jews about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict through personal and artistic expression. Submissions to the journal range from poetry to personal stories, and provide a constructive alternative to the highly polarized academic arguments that dominate university campuses across the country.

"The project has an inherent value in opening people up to things they might have, emotionally, not even wanted to look at," said Greenberg, adding that Yalla's goal is to humanize the conflict.

Yalla Journal was founded at McGill University in Montreal in 2004. Since then three boards, with Arab and Jewish members, have published two editions of the journal.

When Greenberg heard about the journal from a friend on the board, Ghassan Abou-Hamra, it had been almost eight months since any significant work was done on the volunteer project.

With Abou-Hamra's help, Greenberg revived Yalla Journal, creating a new board and eventually taking over as the director in March of this year. The new board has collected a bank of submissions, redesigned the website and begun fundraising to create a third edition of the journal.

Though he was not around when the decision to name the project was made, Greenberg thinks it was a good choice.

"It means 'let's get going' ... People always talk about how there will be peace in 100 years, right? But if we don't get started now, why would 100 years be any different?" he said.

Yalla Journal submissions come primarily from people aged 18 to 30.

"[People in this age group] are still forming their beliefs, and maybe they're overly passionate, and so the trick is to catch people before they go out into the world and they make those important contributions," said Greenberg.

Greenberg graduated from the University of Toronto this past April with a degree in political science and human biology. He is considering a future career in political and social journalism or in medicine, but for now, the journal is his main focus.

"I want the next edition published [and] I want to leave Yalla a legacy of stable funding [and] set up practices [to keep it organized]," he said.

Greenberg hopes that the next edition of the journal will be put to practical use in volunteer programs in Israel and the West Bank.

"I want the book to be used," he said, "not just individually distributed to people to read."

According to Greenberg, Yalla Journal has received positive feedback from the Toronto community. However, some Arab and Jewish groups have made it known that they do not support the Yalla project, specifically because Yalla does not take a side in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Greenberg and his peers on the board are careful to keep their personal stances on the conflict from influencing the work they do for Yalla.

"We do have really different opinions, but that's OK," he said, adding that nothing can be accomplished in the way of peace without taking time to listen to stories from both sides.

Earlier this month, Torontonians had the opportunity to do just that. Yalla Journal organized Confronting Ourselves, an event that featured young Arabs, Jews and others who were interested in the conflict and sharing stories, poetry and songs, many of which were submissions to the journal.

Asher Greenberg, the director of Yalla Journal.

The event took place at the Free Times Café in downtown Toronto, where close to 100 guests noshed on falafel and latke platters while watching performers in the intimate setting.

As the event began, Greenberg told the audience, "We don't have an agenda to tell you the truth... We do, however, hope you listen with an open mind and an open heart."

The audience heard pieces ranging from a story about soccer and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict to an amusing poem about hummus called Spreads of Seduction.

They were also treated to Middle Eastern-influenced music played by Aviva Chernick and Aaron Lightstone of the band Jaffa Road.

Yalla board member Najat Abdel-Hadi, 23, shared her emotional story of growing up in the West Bank city of Nablus, and of her first encounter with Israelis in the Diaspora.

She said that she believes Yalla Journal fosters the kind of dialogue necessary to create stable peace in the Middle East.

Audience member and well-known Canadian journalist Jan Wong said she thought the event was very interesting and suitable for Yalla's cause.

"Just putting [the event] together means people talk and sit and eat together," she said.

"I'm shocked and amazed. I think people have been so positive and so warm," said Yalla board member Naomi Kramer.

With the success of Confronting Ourselves, Yalla Journal is hoping to put on another event soon. Greenberg and his new board are committed to keeping the dialogue going with the next edition of the journal set to be published in the coming year.

For more information about the journal or to submit a piece, visit www.yallajournal.com.

Poland recovers stolen Auschwitz sign

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WARSAW — Five men detained over the theft of the metal sign that hung over the former Nazi death camp of Auschwitz acted on financial motives and were not members of a neo-Nazi group, Polish police said on Monday, hours after the sign was recovered.

The theft last Friday triggered worldwide condemnation, especially from Israeli and Jewish groups. Polish authorities made the recovery of the sign, which reads Arbeit Macht Frei (Work sets you free), a top priority.

"We can say that none of the five are members of a neo-Nazi group… Their intent was undoubtedly robbery related. We will be able to decide later whether the crime was ordered or whether they acted on their own initiative," Andrzej Rokita, district police chief in the city of Krakow, told a news conference.

The 16-foot-long sign, which was forged by prisoners at the camp, was found across the country in northern Poland, and was cut into three pieces, according to reports.

Police and anonymous donors had offered a reward of nearly $40,000 for information leading to the sign's return.

The five men, whose ages ranged from 20 to 39, were detained early Monday and transferred to a police station in the southern city of Krakow.

Some 1.5 million people, mostly Jews, were killed in the Nazi death camp in southern Poland during World War II. Prisoners arriving at the camp used to enter via a relatively small iron gate topped by the German-language motto.

More than 200 hectares of the former death camp became a museum after the war ended. The sign's wording became a symbol of the Nazis' deception of their victims before murdering them.

The theft occurred one day after Germany said it would contribute $87 million (US) to the new Auschwitz-Birkenau Foundation, which earlier this year launched a campaign to raise $172 million to preserve the remains of the death camp as a memorial and museum.

There are about 450 buildings and remains of buildings at the site, including the ruins of gas chambers, as well as 80,000 pairs of shoes of victims and 3,800 suitcases.

EU official's 'occupation' remark draws criticism

By AKIVA ELDAR

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli government officials in Jerusalem harshly criticized the European Union's (EU) new high representative for foreign affairs and security policy, Catherine Ashton, for her scathing remarks in her maiden speech about the "Israeli occupation."

Ashton last week levelled scathing criticism at Israeli policy in her first speech since taking on her new position.

Government officials in Jerusalem said they were surprised, dissatisfied and concerned that such a senior figure had expressed criticism before visiting Israel and learning the facts.

They said the remarks cast a pall over relations with the European Union, adding they were particularly angry that she had not welcomed the freeze on construction in the settlements, as had her European colleagues.

The British stateswoman, whose full title is Baroness Ashton of Upholland, has also served as the commissioner for trade in the European Commission. She said that in the EU's view, "East Jerusalem is occupied territory, together with the West Bank."

Ashton demanded that Israel immediately lift its blockade on the Gaza Strip, and reiterated that the EU opposes the existence of the West Bank separation fence, as it opposes evictions of Palestinians from their homes in east Jerusalem.

She also described Israel's partial freeze of West Bank settlement construction as only a "first step," as opposed to the warmer description of the move by EU foreign ministers, who last week took "positive note" of it.

In her address to members of the European Parliament (MEPs) in Strasbourg, France, Ashton said she had spoken with Israelis, Palestinians and U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton about the role the Quartet of international mediators (the European Union, the United States, the United Nations and Russia), and that of Britain's special envoy to the region, Tony Blair.

Ashton said she had told Blair personally that "the Quartet must demonstrate that it is worth the money, that it is capable of being reinvigorated."

Hers was not the only unwarranted criticism of Israel. Following her comments, a number of MEPs from the Liberal side of the house called for punitive measures against Israel. Irish centre-left member Proinsias De Rossa, who visited the West Bank last week, called Israel's treatment of Palestinians a form of apartheid.

Fighting anti-Semitism key to defending human rights

By HERSHELL EZRIN

Guest Voice

Reason and passion uneasily faced off at the third Global Forum for Combating Antisemitism, held in Jerusalem on Dec. 16 and 17. With more than 400 experts from Africa, Asia, Europe, North and South America, as well as parliamentarians from a dozen countries and the leadership of the International Coalition for Combating Antisemitism in attendance, the challenge for the participants as well as the conference organizers was to find time to absorb, balance and debate conflicting opinions, priorities and personal experiences within a jam-packed agenda.

Defining the new anti-Semitism and evaluating the multiplicity of current and proposed methods including new technologies for fighting the mutating virus slammed into renewed "tachlis" pressures to share best practices and calls to concentrate on implementation of actual solutions to specific campus issues such as boycotts and "Israeli Apartheid Week."

Several important themes emerged. The challenge to the collective Jew (Israel) as a regeneration and restatement of traditional threats to the individual Jew received much attention, particularly in the linkage of the anti-Semitism of the left and the right and its basis on tropes of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion. In a brilliant tour de force, Liberal MP Irwin Cotler traced the current evolution of the forces of delegitimization and compared them to the situation 30 years ago.

Experts, including Muslim scholars from Europe and Africa, tackled the thorny issue of the rise of Islamist radicalism and anti-Semitism, its penetration into the mainstream of Muslim society and the ways to respond in order to preserve western values

However, in one powerful workshop intervention, a Swedish member of parliament flagged the twin importance of finding non-Jewish spokespeople to carry out the fight while acknowledging the dangers to everyone's credibility in aligning with xenophobic right-wing groups. Israeli Prize-winner Yehuda Bauer made the telling point that the threats existing among second-generation Muslim immigrants derive primarily from their disaffection with and lack of integration into broader society. This translates into the need to fight Islamaphobia in order to be successful in fighting anti-Semitism among this group.

A second message revolved around the place of the Shoah in anti-Semitic discourse. While the pernicious inversion of the Holocaust against Jews as well as efforts to make it irrelevant was noted with concern, participants also cited Holocaust fatigue and growing resistance to the use of Shoah as a defence mechanism.

Leading Jewish scholars and activists from both Israel and the Diaspora went further, challenging persistent Jewish use of the Shoah as the dominant explanation for Israel's creation and right to exist. Equally, the focus on Holocaust education would not address the new anti-Semitism attacking the collective Jew. Without downplaying the Shoah's importance, they argued that Jews surrender the narrative to Palestinians when we fail to articulate the important historical and religious rationales supporting the State of Israel.

A third direction that resonated well with delegates stressed the importance of addressing new technologies. Experts demanded that the Internet be treated like a country with its own culture and social rules. Today, unfortunately, hate is acceptable on the Internet more than in any other country.

But the eternal message that fighting anti-Semitism is a critical part of defending human rights and western values was also strongly defended throughout the conference. While the challenges are great, our side has to take the same long view as do those who practise anti-Semitism.

Canada was strongly represented, with Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney and Cotler delivering well-received major addresses. They were joined by the co-chairs of the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition, Conservative MP Scott Reid and Liberal MP Mario Silva, who have been leading the parliamentary inquiry on anti-Semitism, as well as the leadership of major Jewish organizations.

Hershell Ezrin is chief executive officer of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy.

Court says school discriminated

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — The British Supreme Court ruled last Wednesday that a London Jewish school was guilty of racial discrimination for refusing entry to a boy whose mother had become Jewish in a non-Orthodox conversion.

The nine judges sitting on Britain's highest judicial body said the policy employed by the popular JFS school in north London broke the law by using ethnicity to decide which pupils to admit. However, they said the faith school, which is rated as outstanding by government inspectors, had not been "racist."

Equality campaigners welcomed the verdict, which means Jewish schools in Britain can no longer apply an admissions criterion using an ethnicity-based test.

But Jewish leaders said the verdict, passed by a narrow five to four majority, showed the difficulty in applying modern law to 3,500 years of Jewish tradition, and warned it could have an impact on other Jewish organizations.

The case was brought after the school refused to admit a boy, known as M, whose father was a practising Jew and whose mother had converted to Judaism at a non-Orthodox synagogue.

The faith school, which is over-subscribed, gives precedence to children recognized as ethnically Jewish by the Office of the Chief Rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregation of the Commonwealth (OCR).

The OCR stipulates that people are Jewish if they are descended through the maternal line from a woman who is Jewish or has undergone an Orthodox conversion course.

The Supreme Court decided that JFS had breached the Race Relations Act, as it had failed to demonstrate that its policy was proportionate.

U.K. moves to end arrest threats

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Britain has begun to make good on Foreign Secretary David Miliband's pledge to reform the law that enables judges to order the arrest of visiting Israeli politicians and generals, the Guardian reported last Thursday.

The move came after the authority to issue such warrants under a "universal jurisdiction" rubric was recently used against opposition leader Tzipi Livni. It could, however, be also invoked against other world leaders, such as Barack Obama or Vladimir Putin.

According to the Guardian, Britain's attorney general will be asked to approve warrants before suspected war criminals can be arrested in future, under a plan being negotiated by the Foreign Office in response to the row over attempts to arrest Livni.

Pro-Palestinian activists sought to have the former foreign minister arrested over her role in alleged war crimes committed during last winter's offensive against Hamas in Gaza.

Discussions have begun in Whitehall on creating "safeguards" in criminal cases against visiting foreign leaders, the British paper reported.

British Prime Minister Gordon Brown called Livni last week to say he "completely opposed" the arrest warrant issued against her, saying that she was welcome in Britain any time.

Kenney raps church group

Ottawa's withdrawal of funding to KAIROS, a Canadian church-based group, last month is an example of Canada's "zero-tolerance approach to anti-Semitism," Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney said last week.

The minister, who was speaking at the Global Forum for Combating Antisemitism in Jerusalem, accused the organization of having an anti-Israel agenda.

"We have defunded organizations, most recently like KAIROS, who are taking a leadership role in the boycott [of Israel]," Kenney said. He went on to compare the group to organizations such as the Canadian Arab Federation and the Canadian Islamic Congress, "whose president notoriously said that all Israelis over the age of 18 are legitimate targets for assassination," he said.

The Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) recently rejected the group's $7-million grant renewal application after a 35-year-long relationship with the organization. CIDA's funds made up about 40 per cent of KAIROS' annual budget.

In rejecting the $7 million in funding over four years, International Co-operation Minister Bev Oda didn't mention Kairos' record on Israel. Instead, she said its mandate doesn't meet CIDA's current priorities, which include food security, children and youth and economic growth.

In the past, KAIROS has taken issue with Canadian mining practices abroad and warned of environmental hazards in the Alberta tar sands. It has also campaigned against bottled water production in Canada.

KAIROS, also known as the Canadian Ecumenical Justice Initiative, is an interdenominational Christian organization based in Toronto that works for international social justice. Its member churches include the Anglican, United and Presbyterian churches of Canada, as well as the Quakers and Mennonites and the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Mary Corkery, its executive director, said Kenney's allegations are "outrageous."

"There is a campaign of boycott [of Israel]. The only part that we have accepted as a possibility is divestment," she said. "We decided against boycott and sanctions."

Corkery is especially upset about the context of Kenney's speech, which included the topic of terrorism.

"It's naming us anti-Semitic in a context that's one of violence and it's totally inappropriate," she said.

During his Jerusalem speech, Kenney admitted the government has been criticized for its decisions, but, he added, "we believe that we've done theses things for the right reasons and we stand by these decisions." Kairos' church partners are supporting its condemnation of Kenney's remarks and its calls to reinstate its funding.

Life thrives in oasis alongside Dead Sea

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Set on the edge of the parched and rock-strewn Judaen desert, Ein Gedi is home to a variety of flora and fauna, creatures large and small that prove life thrives even in the most forbidding of landscapes.

Ein Gedi is also home to ghosts from the past – if you know where to look for them.

In one memorable episode from the Bible, as told by our guide, Ido, the young David, fleeing the wrathful King Saul, hides out at Ein Gedi. Saul, in pursuit, reaches the desert oasis adjacent to the Salt (Dead) Sea, but tired from his efforts, lies down to rest

David spies him and quietly makes his way to where the king has fallen asleep. He removes the king's sword, pulls a corner of his robe and slams the sword through the robe into the ground.

Then he crosses the dried-out wadi, picks up some stones (he didn't have to look far), and hurls them at the king. The startled Saul wakes up and tries to rise, but is pinned down by the sword. David calls to him, "See, Saul, I am not your enemy. I could have killed you where you slept."

It is one of the remarkable aspects of a trip to the Holy Land that stories from the Bible gain immediacy and a sense of place, even though they occurred some 3,000 years ago.

The wadi (dried out river bed) that David crossed to get to Saul is still there, though the exact spot of the encounter is unknown, Ido explained. You could be standing on the same spot as David.

Today, Ein Gedi is better known for the cool sweet water that springs out of the ground and creates mini-waterfalls. Visitors can trek hundreds of feet to the top of the canyon or choose less rigorous walks to view the site, which, with its four spring-fed streams, has been designated a national park.

The naturally skittish ibex (like a medium-sized mountain sheep) keep their distance, but small rodent-like rock hyrex show no fear, coming right up to visitors, sniffing for a handout.

The area is home to other wildlife such as foxes, snakes, ravens, Tristram's grackles (a type of bird) and even wolves, hyenas and leopards, though a brief visit to the site failed to uncover any of the (mostly nocturnal) predators.

Nearby is the kibbutz of Ein Gedi, a lush garden in the desert. Walking its grounds, you'd never imagine you're in the middle of a desert that receives on average less than three inches (70 millimetres) of precipitation each year. The kibbutz's man-made oasis features 1,000 plants from around the world, including numerous species of cacti. A centrepiece is a massive baobab tree, which can live for 2,000 years.

Kibbutz Ein Gedi was established in 1956 and in 1959 assumed its current location on a plateau overlooking the Dead Sea. It offers panoramic views of the sea and the mountains of Moab across the border in Jordan.

The kibbutz runs a resort with three classes of accommodations, plus a tourist spa, and the cool, well-watered grounds provide a refreshing respite from the arid surroundings.

Massada and Ein Bokek, where more than a dozen hotels are located, are only a few kilometres to the south, while Qumran, where the Dead Sea scrolls were uncovered, is to the north, making it a convenient location from which to explore the area.

In ancient times, the area was known for persimmon oil and rare perfumes. It was also famous for its dates and was a thriving settlement during Hasmonean times (150s BCE) until the end of the Byzantine period (500s CE).

Its history dates back 5,000 years, to the end of the Stone Age and the beginning of the age of copper.

Temples and synagogues were established in Ein Gedi in ancient times, and today, an ancient synagogue's mosaic floor, containing Hebrew and Aramaic inscriptions, is open to the public.

Demjanjuk unmoved by survivors' testimony

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BERLIN — As the trial of suspected Nazi war criminal John Demjanjuk continued in Germany on Monday after a three-week break, relatives of people killed at the Nazis' Sobibor death camp delivered emotional accounts of their losses.

Demjanjuk sat impassively while Holocaust survivors on Monday recalled the horrors of Nazi Germany at his trial on charges of helping to force 27,900 Jews into gas chambers in 1943.

Philip Jacobs – among dozens of relatives who joined Demjanjuk's trial as co-plaintiffs as allowed under German law – told a Munich court on Monday that his girlfriend and parents perished at Sobibor.

"I lost the love of my life and I have missed my parents very much," the 87-year-old Dutch man testified. He said that the events of that time "mark every day of my life."

Robert Cohen, himself an Auschwitz survivor, testified that his brother and parents went to Sobibor "and I never saw them again."

Cohen, 83, said he spent 27 months at various camps and recalled at one point being transported in open railway cars for 10 days without being given any food.

He remembered that prisoners initially had no idea what the Nazis had in store for them. "We were very naive," he said.

Also among the Dutch Jews murdered at Sobibor were the parents of Marco de Groot, 70, who was 3-1/2 years old when they were rounded up by the Nazis. He said he escaped being arrested along with his mother in Tilburg because he was playing at a neighbour's house.

"My mother was heavily pregnant, so I'm here for my unborn brother or sister too," he told the court.

Robert Jean Wurms, whose two half-sisters were killed at Sobibor and whose father died at Auschwitz, said he found out about their fate from his foster mother when he was 10 or 11.

"Back then, I understood a bit what had happened," the 66-year-old said. "Later, when you grow up, you understand more and more, and it weighs on you more and more.'

Demjanjuk, 89, wearing a blue baseball cap, was brought into court in a wheelchair and kept his eyes shut throughout the testimony.

Chief rabbi visits vandalized mosque.

Israeli chief rabbi Yona Metzger visited the West Bank village of Yasuf where a mosque was vandalized. He was under the protection of the Israel Defence Forces and Palestinian police. Palestinian protesters hit Rabbi Metzger with rocks as he left the village. "I came here to express my revulsion at this wretched act of burning a place holy to the Muslim people," he said. "This is how the Holocaust began, the tragedy of the Jewish people of Europe." Vandals assumed to be extremists raided a mosque in Yasuf before dawn Dec. 11, burning furniture, prayer rugs and holy texts and defacing the mosque's walls. Rabbi Metzger's visit came a day after a delegation of rabbis and Israelis from the West Bank tried to enter the village to help refurbish the mosque and to deliver copies of the Qur'an to replace the Muslim holy books burned in the attack. The group from Gush Etzion, which is south of Jerusalem, was detained at a checkpoint, where they met with village elders.

Turkish president to visit

Turkey's president accepted an invitation from his Israeli counterpart to visit. Abdullah Gul and Shimon Peres met last Friday on the sidelines of the climate conference in Copenhagen. Gul's agreement to visit comes following months of tensions between Israel and Turkey sparked by disagreements over Israel's war in Gaza last winter with Hamas. Gul said Turkey was ready to resume its mediating role between Israel and Arab countries, Israel Radio reported. It didn't report whether a date had been set for the visit.

MKs threaten U.K. boycott

Israeli lawmakers are threatening to boycott British products in retaliation for special labeling of products from the West Bank. One-third of Israel's 120 lawmakers have signed a petition that will be delivered to Britain's Parliament, according to reports. The petition drive is being led by the Kadima Party's Ronit Tirosh, who said she would draft a bill requiring British products to be labelled. Tirosh also called for a boycott of British airlines. Earlier this month, the British government issued an advisory allowing retailers to label products originating from the West Bank as being produced in Israeli settlements or by Palestinians.

PLO extends Abbas' term

The PLO extended the term of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. Meeting in Ramallah, the Palestine Liberation Organization's Central Council agreed to keep Abbas in office until new elections can be scheduled. His term expires Jan. 25. Palestinian elections scheduled for next month were cancelled when Hamas refused to allow the vote to go forward in the Gaza Strip, which it controls. Abbas, 74, has said he won't run for re-election. Hamas doesn't recognize the extension, Al Jazeera reported. The Central Council also agreed last week that peace talks with Israel couldn't resume until Israel halts all building in settlements, including east Jerusalem.

Israeli wins Chess World Cup

Israel's top-ranked player won the 2009 Chess World Cup. Boris Gelfand, a grand master from Rishon LeZion, defeated former world champion Ruslan Ponomariov of Ukraine in a playoff Dec. 14 in the Russian town of Khanty-Mansiysk to take the $120,000 (US) top prize. Gelfand, 41, was the No. 1-seed among 128 players in the event, which had a prize pool of $1.6 million. Ranked sixth in the world, Gelfand is now eligible to compete in the 2010 World Championships as one of the eight best players in the world. He immigrated to Israel from Belarus in 1998.

Prague's Jewish Quarter is an interplay of past and present

By ELISA BIRNBAUM
Special to The CJN

PRAGUE — One step into the cavernous, dimly lit room, and the names hit you like a sucker punch to the gut. There are thousands of them: first names, last names, names of cities, villages. Some are written in black, others in red. It's an overwhelming display, leaving one breathless.

Welcome to the Pinkas Synagogue. Situated on Siroka Street, nestled in the heart of Josefov, Prague's Jewish Quarter, the building, like many others in the area, boasts a past worth re-telling. My well-versed private guide, Vaclav Lojka, said that the shul, founded by Aaron Meshullam Horowitz in 1535, is the second-oldest synagogue in the quarter. But it's what transpired in the late 1950s that explains the lineups outside its door and the room packed with tourists and schoolchildren, their disturbed silence as deafening as the names that encircle them.

In 1958, the Pinkas Synagogue became a memorial to approximately 80,000 Czech Holocaust victims. Lined with information compiled from transport papers and registration lists, as well as survivor accounts, the walls are a literal wallpaper of epitaphs. Each victim's name – along with dates of birth and death – is arranged alphabetically, according to the town he or she lived in before deportation.

On the second floor of the synagogue, you'll find another memorial: an exhibition of drawings made at Terezin concentration camp from 1942 to 1944 by children, the majority of whom were deported to Auschwitz. The depictions are a moving testament of the power of art to fuel both hope and despair.

Prague's Jewish Quarter is a fascinating interplay of past and present, old and new. Though it's seen a renaissance, it remains deeply rooted in history, refusing to let go of its oft-painful narrative. The dynamic explains how the Old-New Synagogue – the oldest surviving synagogue in Europe wherein time seemingly stands still – can intersect with an ultra-modern street on which shops sell designer wear by Louis Vuitton and Christian Dior. With every step forward, vestiges of the past hark back to what was once the most vibrant Jewish community in Europe and home to some of the world's most influential rabbinical scholars, Jewish writers and thinkers. These ghosts keep you company in the quarter, constant reminders of times past.

Goltz-Kinsky Palace, old town square

Take the literary spirit of Franz Kafka. Though his feelings toward his birthplace have been seen as ambivalent, the writer's footsteps are as ubiquitous in Prague as fried dumplings and cold beer. He was born in 1883 at U Radnice 5, and today the house – with his cast-iron bust affixed to its entrance – holds a Kafka exposition and restaurant. Walk into the Old Town Square and you'll find the stunning Goltz-Kinsky Palace, the former site of Kafka's secondary school, as well as the location of his father's retail store. These days, the white and pink stucco building houses collections of the National Gallery.

Retrace your steps back to Siroka Street and at the cusp of the Jewish Quarter, you'll find Café Franz Kafka. It is a throwback to the café culture that played a seminal role in the writer's life and writings. Stepping into the coffee house feels like entering a time warp. Inside, the smoke-filled, musty interior, which is replete with dark wooden chairs and tables, you'll find engravings of the Jewish Quarter and an abundance of Kafka portraits and memorabilia.

Tombstone of Rabbi Loew, 1609

Kafka's coffee house, Siroka street [E. Birnbaum photos]

Finally, walk toward the Spanish Synagogue on Dusni Street, where Kafka spent a good part of his life, and you'll be greeted by a unique tribute by Czech artist Jaroslav Rona: a 12-foot bronze statue of the lawyer-cum-writer sitting on the shoulders of a headless figure. Unveiled in 2003, the statue's inspiration comes from a short story Kafka penned about a man riding another's shoulders through Prague's streets.

Of course, a story about the ghosts of the Jewish Quarter wouldn't be complete without a mention of Josefov's most compelling figure: Rabbi Judah Loew ben Bezalel. Known by many, simply, as the Maharal, Prague's former chief rabbi is considered one of Judaism's most pre-eminent rabbinical scholars, thanks largely to his writings on Jewish philosophy, mysticism and the Talmud.

But the Maharal's reputation is also attributed to the golem legend. Rabbi Loew, the story goes, fashioned a golem out of clay and brought him to life, giving him supernatural powers to protect the Jews of Prague from persecution. The legend further proposes that the Golem's remains reside in the attic of the Old-New Synagogue. It is perhaps no coincidence that at a time of recessionary and other troubles, there's been an increase in depictions and sightings of the Golem in Prague.

Its "creator" remains in the forefront of people's minds, too, as this year marks the 400th anniversary of the rabbi's death. In commemoration, the Jewish Museum and the Prague Castle held an exhibit on Rabbi Loew's life and work, exploring the religious, pedagogical and philosophical legacy of this larger-than-life scholar.

It was a fitting tribute to a man who, like the Jewish Quarter he inhabited, keeps us tied to the past while giving us inspiration and fodder with which to surge forward.

STAGECRAFT COMPANY PRESENTS BROOKLYN BOY, BY DONALD MARGULIES

Holy Blossom Temple Stagecraft Company is preparing to present Brooklyn Boy, a comedy by Donald Margulies. The plot focuses on a writer whose bestselling autobiographical novel does not garner the kind of respect and approval he's hoping for. "It's a laugh-out-loud comedy about someone who's written about growing up Jewish in Brooklyn – and discovering he can't escape its reality," said director Michael Ryval.

Playwright Margulies, originally a Brooklyn Boy himself, is a professor of English literature at Yale University. He has written more than 30 plays, including The Loman Family Picnic and Dinner with Friends, which won the Pulitzer Prize in 2000.

Featured in the Stagecraft production of Brooklyn Boy are Ron Boyd, Susanne Egier, David Fournier, Karen Garmaise, Harry Hochman, Teresa Labriola and Tal Maissner. $18, $15. Names in the News: Two Israeli authors have won a prize worth approximately $15,000 from organizations in Turkey and Europe for a book on the development of banking in Palestine.

In their new book – Sephardi Entrepreneurs in Jerusalem: The Valero Family 1800-1948 – Hebrew University professor Ruth Kark and geographer Joseph B. Glass examine one of Jerusalem's founding families, the Valeros, who were responsible for establishing the first private bank in Israel.

Besides encapsulating some family history, the book is "a cultural study of the life of a family from the higher echelons of Jerusalem in the 19th and the first half of the 20th century," Kark said. "It's a rare glimpse at the day-to-day lives of Jews living in Ottoman-ruled Palestine, and a look at entrepreneurship in the Middle East during this time in history."

The $15,000 prize is awarded to winners of a competition for research on the history of banking and finance sponsored by the Ottoman Bank Archives and Research Centre, the European Association for Banking and Financial History, and the History Foundation of Turkey. The book was published by Gefen Publishing of Jerusalem.

Harvey Fierstein is no stranger to Tevye role

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

When the ailing veteran performer Topol had to pull out of Fiddler on the Roof, the show's producers turned to Tony Award-winning actor and playwright Harvey Fierstein to play the lead role of Tevye.

The Brooklyn-born thespian is no stranger to the role. He played the iconic milkman in the musical's Broadway revival in 2005.

Toronto audiences can catch this Jerome Robbins-inspired production, directed by Sammy Dallas Bayes – the choreographer of the Broadway revival – at the Canon Theatre in Toronto.

Fierstein admits joining this production at short notice has been a challenge. He's a homebody and had to leave his dog, cats, friends and his newly built Connecticut home behind, but says if you want to have an exciting life and a great adventure, it's all worth it in the end.

Fierstein speaks of Tevye as a man who has God as his best friend. "People certainly have intimate relationships with their faith, but he really and truly believes that he has conversations with God. He is a man who is very close to his creator. He would even say, 'I have God in my back pocket.' Of course, God would say he has him in his back pocket.

"It makes him kind of a dreamer, and as we see in the show, when things happen, he is willing to get creative. When Tevye's daughter wanted to marry Motel the tailor, this guy comes up with this whole elaborate dream. That is not your everyday person. It is someone with great creativity and imagination, zeal for life and, frankly, great love for his daughter that he is willing to go that far."

Fierstein says Fiddler would not mean so much to him had he not grown up Jewish. "My father died some 30 years ago, but I am playing him. I am playing the man whom I sat next to when I first saw the show when I was a child. I am playing all the men that I grew up with, all those friends of my father's.

"There are line readings that I say are 'Max Conan.' He is a man that I grew up with – he had Nazi numbers tattooed on his arm. I grew up in this world, and I am able to bring it to life through these men who gave me life."

Before Fierstein took on the role of Tevye, he watched the silent film Tevye and His Daughters and created a scene with one of the daughters – Havala – based on that film. He says that an artist uses all the inspirations that are available.

"I lived Jewish-centric, growing up in Brooklyn the way I did, with the yeshiva and the Jewish community house on the same block," says Fierstein. "Most of my friends were Italian or Jewish. I happen to be an atheist, which has nothing to do with being Jewish. In a funny way, there is a great Jewish tradition of atheism.

"People think of Judaism as a religion, but we are not, we are a people. I always say, 'If you think Jews are white, just ask a Ku Klux Klansman, and he will tell you, we ain't white.' I have no problem identifying with this, and it is amazing to play somebody who has such a deep belief that he's being taken care of."

The actor finds it fascinating that, as the play goes on, Tevye begins to question whether God is taking care of him. By the end of the first act, he's standing centre stage, looking up and asking God, "Why?"

Fierstein says by that point faith is almost a luxury that Tevye doesn't have time for. Fierstein says it is like Tevye saying to God, "God, it's really nice to know you, but I've gotta pack and get my family safely out of here – that's what I need to do."

Fierstein has won Tony Awards for both writing and playing the lead role in his play Torch Song Trilogy, and he received a Tony in 2003 for best actor in a musical for the Broadway production of Hairspray.

Fierstein recreated his role in Torch Song Trilogy in the film adaptation. In addition, he was in the films Mrs. Doubtfire, Bullets Over Broadway and Independence Day.

Fierstein was exposed to theatre at a young age thanks to his mother, who took him to see everything from Yiddish Theatre and the Royal Shakespeare Company to the Bolshoi Ballet.

This is the actor's first time gracing a Toronto stage, but he has spent time here in the past filming movies.

In April, he'll be back on Broadway starring in La Cage.

When he's not on stage, he likes to walk his dog, watch Oprah, go antiquing and junking, go to auctions, make quilts, paint, cook and visit friends.

Fiddler on the Roof runs at the Canon Theatre until Jan. 10. For tickets, call 416-872-1212.

Yoal Sharabi: two flutes, a guitar and a beautiful tenor

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — When singer Yoal Sharabi was a teenager studying at Sde Boker High School in the Negev, he was asked to perform a few Sephardi melodies at the 83rd birthday celebration of former Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion.

During that performance he realized he wanted to sing and perform professionally for the rest of his life.

Sharabi, a natural-born entertainer with true stage presence, enthralled an audience here at the Berney Theatre with his wide repertoire of modern Hebrew, classic Yemenite, popular chassidic and Spanish songs on Dec. 14.

The younger brother of famous Israeli singer Boaz Sharabi, Yoal has a powerful tenor voice that captivates an audience. In addition, he is a terrific guitarist, percussionist and flutist. He wowed the crowd when he played two flutes in perfect harmony.

"The first instrument I learned to play when I lived in the Negev was the flute," said Sharabi, the youngest of 10 children, who taught himself to play a variety of instruments because his family was too poor to afford music lessons. He began his professional career as a flutist in the Be'er Sheva Dance Company, moving to New York in the 1980s.

After playing an exquisite rendition of Manginat HeHalil (The Flute Melody), evocative of the deep romantic rhythms of the desert, the charismatic Sharabi held up two flutes to show the audience.

"On the first I will play the melody, and on the second I will play the harmony," he said as he played the two simultaneously from different sides of his mouth.

In one of the Yemenite selections, Sharabi even began banging on the guitar as if it were a darbuka (goblet-shaped drum), showing his impressive versatility as a performer. In between musical selections, Sharabi charmed the audience by sharing his memories of growing up in Tel Aviv.

"I was born in Tel Aviv and was very lucky to have been born in a hospital, as most of my brothers and sisters were home deliveries," he said. "We moved into an apartment that was one of the most modern high rises in Tel Aviv at the time – four floors and no elevator.

"I was known as the building trouble maker. I use to tie a rope to the doors of two apartments and ring both doorbells. My parents didn't know what to do with me, so they sent me to a boarding school in Sde Boker."

Sharabi, who now resides in New York and Tel Aviv, opened the concert by singing a lively medley of Chanukah songs, and then began performing a delicate and beautiful rendition of Al Tashlicheni (Don't Forsake Me) and a soulful prayer-like Hebrew song, Guard Me as a Child.

In a post-concert interview, Sharabi told The CJN that "everyone in my family was musical. It came from my father, who immigrated to Israel in 1912. He was the unofficial cantor in his synagogue in Yemen, where there are no cantors traditionally." As a child in Tel Aviv, Sharabi grew up singing with his older siblings at the Shabbat table.

At the Winnipeg concert, people of all ages clapped and sang along, especially during his rendition of Halleluyah, Beshana Haba'ah and Mashiach, Mashiach. There were even some audience members who danced the horah, during the latter number.

Sharabi has performed at some of the most renowned concert halls, including Lincoln Centre and Carnegie Hall in New York, Place Des Arts in Montreal (when he was only 16), and Garden State Plaza in New Jersey. Film director Stephen Spielberg hired Sharabi to perform at his 1991 wedding to actor Kate Capshaw.

In the latter part of the Winnipeg concert, Sharabi showed off his broad repertoire, by throwing off his jacket, dawning a vest and cap, and belting out songs from Fiddler on the Roof as he danced around the stage.

He also told the audience about a time when he performed for a non-Jewish, Spanish-speaking audience in Argentina. "I only know a bit of Spanish, that I had picked up here and there," he said. "So I opened my songs with a few recognizable Spanish words, and then switched into Hebrew and the audience didn't know the difference."

Sharabi's performance here was sponsored by Chabad of Winnipeg.

Roth's aging male burdened by existential fears

The Humbling recalls the furor caused by Portnoy's Complaint

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Forty years ago, a major review of Philip Roth's Portnoy's Complaint pointed to Roth's "maturity" and "exceptional talent," alongside the opinion that Portnoy "was one of the dirtiest books ever published."

Recent reviews of Roth's new novel, The Humbling (Hamish Hamilton), have focused on the role sex plays in it, often to compare the book unfavourably with Roth's earlier work. Like another recent novel, Indignation, which seemed to beckon back to Goodbye, Columbus, The Humbling, in its most provocative scenes, recalls the furor caused by Portnoy's Complaint.

Norman Ravvin

The Humbling is really a long short story, focused on two characters – the once-great New York actor Simon Axler, and Pegeen Stapleford, the much younger woman who enters and transforms his life.

Of Axler's personal predicament Roth writes: "He'd lost his magic. The impulse was spent. He'd never failed in the theatre, everything he had done had been strong and successful, and then the terrible thing happened: he couldn't act. Going onstage became an agony. Instead of the certainty that he was going to be wonderful, he knew he was going to fail. It happened three times in a row, and by the last time, nobody was interested, nobody came. He couldn't get over to the audience. His talent was dead."

After committing himself in response to the agony brought on by this professional collapse, Axler isolates himself on his property in the countryside, periodically flirting with the idea of killing himself. Into this scenario steps Pegeen, a child of friends Axler acted with decades before. And the twist with regard to her is that up till her appearance on Axler's doorstep, she has lived as a lesbian. Roth's reviewers have singled out this plot turn for particular ridicule, and it is true that Roth does little – so little that this strategy must be intentional – to account for Pegeen's choice.

Her relationship with Axler turns on two key developments: an increasing devotion to transgressive sex and Pegeen's willingness to let Axler remake her. They shop extravagantly in New York City and Pegeen's boyish haircut is retooled at "an expensive hairdresser's in the East Sixties."

One thinks of Pygmalion as the backdrop for these scenes, the story of a man's desire to transform a woman that reaches back through George Bernard Shaw and Shakespeare to the Greeks in Ovid's Metamorphoses. But the dark ending of The Humbling exceeds expectations.

Without giving too much away, one can say that the narrative is informed by an ever-present threat in American culture of gun violence. And that Axler, like the aging males at the centre of Roth's The Dying Animal and Everyman, is a figure of great existential fears: fear of death, decline and the meaninglessness of life's efforts resonate in these books. They seem to operate like modern-day tragedies, lean Shakespearian glimpses of the abyss one sees upon recognizing that a life has been lived to little good end.

Roth invokes Anton Chekhov in this light, as he concludes The Humbling with a reflection of how The Seagull presents a portrait of an "aspiring young writer who feels a failure at everything, desperate with defeat at work and love."

These latter themes are Roth's main focus in The Humbling, and they are disturbingly presented, so that the question of what he meant to say about his lesbian character pales alongside them. Reading The Humbling places one in the realm of deep compulsions, of a great sense of loss at life's end. And these themes are evidence of what the reviewer of Portnoy's Complaint recognized as "exceptional talent and an exceptional intelligence."

In 1969, Roth's reviewer wrote that if the author "finds himself among enemies, they are almost certain to be of his own choosing." This is still the case, and so The Humbling retains the provocative and inspiring qualities of Roth's early work.

Norman Ravvin's novel The Joyful Child is forthcoming from Gaspereau Press. He is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Jewish boxer suffers first-round TKO in title match

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Thanks to the miracle of the Internet, I recently was able to avail myself of the rare opportunity of viewing Russian-Jewish boxer Dmitry Salita fight for the World Boxing Association light welterweight title.

The bout came just three weeks after his countryman and close friend Yuri Foreman captured the WBA super welterweight belt with a convincing unanimous decision over Daniel Santos.

Foreman, a Belarus-born Israeli studying to become an Orthodox rabbi in a Brooklyn, N.Y., yeshiva, and still undefeated in 28 bouts, awaited his friend Dmitry, undefeated in 31 matches, to duplicate his accomplishment.

Well, it turned out that while Foreman followed the paths of glory, Salita staggered down the boulevard of broken dreams. From the outset, it had been stated by boxing mavens that on his way up, Salita fought lesser-skilled opponents, while Foreman, who had been rated a more scientific boxer and whose bouts were more like a chess match, took on stiffer challengers.

Another ill omen for Salita was that hours before the bout, he had difficulty meeting the division weight requirement of 140 pounds and had to sweat it out. A subsequent setback at the arena site in Newcastle, England, was the evident crowd-support advantage that champion Amir Khan enjoyed.

Khan, who captured silver in the 2004 Olympic Games, had suffered only one defeat in 21 showings. The Bolton, Lancashire-born pugilist, who turned 23 on Dec. 8, was required to defend his belt since time limits are placed upon title holders.

When taking on a mandatory opponent, a champion's entourage makes certain that their man won't be overmatched by anyone. Salita, supposedly the number 1 contender, appeared to fit the bill. He might put up a decent fight, but not likely to score an upset.

Being the challenger, the Jewish boxer was introduced first, and by the shouts of derision and contempt, one would have imagined that Salita was going to play the villain as in wrestling circles.

Dmitry Salita shows punching power on more successful occasions

In sharp contrast, Khan, a Muslim of Pakistani descent, was heralded by his large throng as the conquering hero. No surprise there, because much like international soccer games, boxing matches attract strong ethnic followings complete with waving flags and England has a large population of Pakistani immigrants.

At the sound of the bell for round 1, the fight announcer barely had time to inform his audience that Salita might be following in the footsteps of former great Jewish champions such as Benny Leonard, Max Baer and Maxie Rosenbloom before reality set in.

Ten seconds into the fight, Khan levelled Salita. The dazed fallen fighter then bounced back up and took a standing eight count while trying desperately to impersonate someone who had just accidentally slipped on a banana peel.

Seconds later, Khan landed another hard right, followed by a flurry of punches, and his obviously outclassed and surprised opponent went down again. From this viewer's perspective, the cat and mouse game was over and the fight ought to have been halted, saving Salita from further serious punishment or possible permanent injury.

Puerto Rican referee Luis Pablon, however, gave Salita his third and last futile opportunity to score an almost improbable upset, and following another barrage of laser-directed blows, the loser's knees buckled once again as he went backward into the ropes and mercifully the challenger's night was over. History will record the outcome as a first-round TKO.

It took only a minute and 16 seconds for King Khan to destroy Salita – it took me a minute and 50 seconds to microwave a bag of low-fat, low-salt popcorn that was as tasteless as the fight's eventual outcome.

Following the ambush, only time will tell whether Salita's people will encourage or discourage their boy from ever entering the ring again.

Dead and Red Seas venues for winter sports

Compiled by CJN Staff

JERUSALEM — The Red and the Dead seas host two important sports events this winter, each with varying degrees of difficulty: Israman, the country's premier long-distance triathlon races held annually in Eilat and the Ein Gedi Half Marathon, which will take place on the shores of the Dead Sea.

Israman, the gruelling Iron Man competition, has been a fixture on the extreme sports scene since 1999. The 2010 Israman and Half-Israman races will be held Jan. 29, 2010 in the southern coastal resort town of Eilat, on the Red Sea. The full Israman competition includes a 3.8-kilometre swim and a 180-kilometre bike ride followed by a 42.2-kilometre run. For those looking for a lesser but still formidable challenge, the Half Israman includes a 1.8-kilometre swim, a 90-kilometre bike ride and a 21.1-kilometre run.

The 27th International Ein Gedi Marathon, in memory of Giora and Tomer Ron, takes place Feb. 20, 2010 and offers a selection of races and activities for amateur athletes and their families. The races include a half-marathon race – one for runners and another for cyclists – a 10-kilometre running and walking race and even a two-kilometre race for children (ages six to 14). Starting near Kibbutz Ein Gedi, the races follow the road along the shores of the Dead Sea through to Masada and back again.

The Dead Sea is a finalist in the online competition for the New 7 Wonders of Nature (vote at www.new7wonders.com).

Walking my daughter home

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

The phone rang – "Hi, Daddy, I'm walking home from the library. Can we talk while I walk?"

It was later in the evening, and I knew my daughter, Talia, had been studying for her midterm examinations at McGill University.

We talked as she walked, and from time to time, she told me where she was. "I'm walking along the park" gave me a visual sense of where she was, as I had been to her apartment a few times and was familiar with the long park and its sports fields opposite her old-fashioned Montreal apartment with the outside stairway.

As we talked, she covered a wide range of subjects, from her studies and issues with her friends and flat-mates to her travel plans for the holidays.

"I'm walking up the stairs now, so I'll say good night. I love you, Daddy." These words are very special coming from my daughter, who is now a senior at university (using the American term for fourth year) and I am a senior by age and career position.

I remember when my daughter and my son, Eytan, were taken to the spot where a bus picked them up and took them to the schools they attended. The neighbourhood primary school, a five-minute walk from our house, was no longer in service. A busing service had been instituted to take the children to schools that were nearby but too far to walk to, so the old school building, which became an administrative office, was the drop-off and pickup spot for the children.

As the children got older and started attending schools for which no school-organized bus service existed, they began travelling on public transportation, or occasionally benefited from a pliant parent who took them to school or dropped them off part way, at the subway.

This is what happened when Talia starting attending a school downtown – something I, a former New Yorker who became independent on the subway system at age nine, supported strongly. Independence on the public transportation system was something I wanted my children to have, and as a result, the whole of Toronto opened up to them, without their parents having to be the doting pickup and delivery service.

The irony is that during the years when she was going to the downtown high school, when I would take her from home to the subway, a 10-minute drive, or on the rare occasion when I was going downtown and could drive her all the way to school, the last thing she wanted to do was talk to me.

"So what do you have today?" was usually answered with "I want to close my eyes and rest until we get to the station (or to school)."

"How did the presentation go yesterday?" was countered with a monosyllabic, "fine," if I was lucky enough to get anything other than "I'd rather not talk about it."

If I picked her up at the subway after school, the conversation was similar – short and not very sweet. I assumed that Talia just did not like to talk to me.

Now our phone walk-and-talks as she returns home have become a bit of a tradition – maybe once a week during this examination study time, when she stays late at the library. I consider them a real treat and a testimony to our close sense of each other. We often get on to topics that make us both laugh, which has increased our sense of each other and strengthened our bonds. How lucky can a father be?

ROASTED-TOMATO SOUP

4 lb. tomatoes, halved lengthwise
6 garlic cloves, peeled
3 tblsp olive oil
1 medium onion, finely chopped
1/2 tsp oregano
2 tsp sugar
2 tblsp butter
3 c parve soup stock

Preheat oven to 350°F. Arrange tomatoes, cut side up, in 1 layer in a large pan; add garlic to pan. Drizzle tomatoes with oil and sprinkle with 1/2 tsp salt and 1/4 tsp pepper. Roast tomatoes and garlic 1 hr.; cool in pan.

In a large heavy soup pot, cook onion, oregano, and sugar in butter over medium heat, stirring until onion is softened. Add tomatoes, garlic, and stock;simmer, covered 20 min. Purée soup in pot with immersion blender, or in batches in a food processor; Season with salt and pepper to taste.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Many of us really want to eat something – or many things – during the evening hours.

There are several potential reasons for this behaviour. If you are truly hungry after dinner, it usually means that you haven't eaten well or haven't had enough to eat throughout the day. But frequently, eating is part of a winding down and relaxing, or it may even be a reward for a hard, busy day. Choices may include wine, chocolate or comfort foods.

For some, it's merely habit – you are used to sitting down to unwind, read or watch TV and snacking, often mindlessly!

The danger is that we are often unaware, or simply lose track, of the amount we are consuming. And we are often eating high fat, high sugar, high calorie foods when we are not even hungry.

I'm sure you can see how this routine will lead to weight gain. But what do you do when you truly want to engage in this comforting, relaxing habit?

My suggestion, which has worked numerous times for both me and my patients, is this: try a hot drink!

Here's why: first, because it's hot and therefore can't be consumed quickly. At this time of day, our hands, mouth and brain usually want to be occupied. They all want to participate, but our stomachs, not so much!

That's why this works perfectly! It's a comfort "food," but without the caloric investment, and because it's hot, it takes time to consume, shutting off all the previously mentioned things that want to be occupied.

Hot drinks come in a million forms, from coffees and teas to clear broth and light hot chocolate. I encourage you to try this trick the next time you feel the need to "eat" when you aren't hungry.

Homelessness really sucks!

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

In recent weeks, a number of people have died while living on the streets of Toronto. Tony passed away at 44 years of age in early December. Tony was created by parents who, for some reason, had no intention of being around, and he was therefore without a home from very early in his childhood.

Childhood homelessness does occur in Toronto. Kids frequently go from foster home to foster home, run away and get tossed into juvenile detention, are released without sufficient support or assistance and end up on the streets again. It's a vicious cycle from which it can be almost impossible to escape. Throughout Tony's life, which ended tragically in the grip of HIV/AIDS, this eternal orphan never had a home. Being confined within walls made him feel claustrophobic, and so he would always return to the cold and lonely streets. They were safe and familiar. Strange to believe, eh?

But Tony was not the only "homeless" Torontonian to die in early December. Have you ever heard of Spring, a young native woman who secured housing after a long struggle to do so?

One night, Spring invited a homeless man to sleep in her home. There was nothing sexual or lascivious about it. She was hospitable and empathized with the man knowing the frigid chills that would run through his body if he were to sleep on the ground wrapped in a cheap sleeping bag. She went to sleep and so did her guest. At some point in the night, he slipped out of bed, grabbed a weapon and bludgeoned Spring to death. That was it. Her murder was brutal. It affected the homeless, especially the natives on the street, in a very powerful way. They did not take the killing of their friend lightly. Grudges can last forever out there. Some tears flowed at her memorial. Anger, though, was everywhere.

Homelessness is complex. Those we call homeless suffer terribly. Some are violent, but most are not. Many are gracious, generous and highly charitable and they need our help.

With this knowledge, it is crucial that we also recognize that the freezing cold winter is back. This season prompts us to consider the amount of snow that has fallen so that we can ski. It also might compel us to consider the tragic reality that human beings, community members, are sleeping in parks tonight, or are huddled in parking garages to stay "warm," at least until they get booted out. Our community members on or near the street ask that we become conscious of their plight so that they are not alone. As survivors, they want us to be cognizant of the reality that dozens of men, women and teens will die this winter outside our homes, some of them in dumpsters meant to protect them from the snow and wind. (Imagine a Torontonian, someone's child, dying in a big, green garbage bin.)

Please post this article and refer to it when it's cold out there. Many of our shuls conduct Out of the Cold programs; Mazon Canada provides funding to organizations that assist the hungry, many of whom are homeless. Donate. Ve'ahavta has vans on the street helping the homeless. Volunteer. Google this information or call Jewish Information Centre (416-635-5600). Take a homeless person for a meal, buy them a coffee, or stop and ask about their welfare. Ask them what they need the most.

In Genesis, Abraham left God in the middle of a conversation to feed "strangers." We could do the same. Homelessness really sucks!
